PREFACE.

CROYDON PUBLIC LIBRARIES CENTRAL

PREFACE.

I.

The present volume, extending over a period of thirty-nine years—from 1406 to 1436—contains the whole extant Exchequer accounts of the regency of the Albanys and the reign of James I.

The Exchequer audits during the regency, fourteen in number, were all held at Perth, and at yearly intervals, except in two instances, namely 1412 and 1420, where the accounts covered a period of two years. Of each audit the accounts of the custumars and bailies of the burghs and of the Chamberlain have been preserved to us.

From James's return to Scotland till his death there seem to have been thirteen audits, held at intervals of a year, Stirling, Edinburgh, Perth, and Linlithgow, all being on different occasions places of audit. Of James's first Exchequer, held in June 1424, two months after his arrival, no rolls have been preserved, nor have we any rolls of the Exchequers of 1427, 1432, and 1433; but we have the burgh accounts of the remaining years of the reign, except 1436. There is a Chamberlain's account of 1426 and another of 1435; in 1434 a short roll of ballivi ad extra, a roll of 1435 connected with the tax imposed for the expenses of the King's captivity in England, and a roll of 1436 giving an account of the expenditure in Flanders for the King's behoof of money principally derived from that tax, the last named being the only roll extant of the audit immediately preceding the King's murder. No sheriffs' accounts, either of the regency or of the reign of James I., have been preserved.

Nineteen of the forty-one rolls in this volume, most of them Chamberlain's accounts under the regency, and comprising about a fourth part of its material, were included in the "Compota Camerariorum Scotiæ." The remaining three-fourths, which are now printed for the first time, form decidedly the most interesting portion of the volume.

In roll CXXXIII. of volume third, audited 15th to 27th March 1405–6, in which Robert III. is still King, and James is designed Steward of Scotland, we have an addition, were any needed, to the accumulated evidence adduced by Ruddiman,[1] that Wyntoun rightly dates Robert's death on Palm Sunday (4th April) 1406, and Bower wrongly on Palm Sunday 1405.

But Ruddiman, Pinkerton, and the later historians who have followed them, are unquestionably wrong in discrediting Bower's statement that Robert's decease almost immediately followed the receipt of the tidings of his son's captivity, and separating the two events by an interval of a year. Walsingham, who was a contemporary, and whose dates are generally more to be depended on than those of the Scottish chroniclers, places the capture among the occurrences of 1406, and makes the death of Sir David Fleming, which took place on the return of that knight from escorting the Prince to his ship at the Bass, an act of retaliation for Fleming's advice to the Earl of Northumberland to escape from Scotland to Wales.[1] Northumberland only arrived in Scotland in June 1405, a date as to which Walsingham is corroborated by the English records, and the period of his residence at St Andrews must have intervened between that date and the Prince's embarkation. The roll just mentioned has a payment "domino quondam David Flemyng,"[2] and entries for expenses of the Prince,[3] but contains no allusion to the capture of the latter, tidings of which had probably not yet reached Scotland. The battle of Longherdmanston was in all probability fought on the day of the month assigned by Bower—14th February—and the English records point to James's imprisonment in the Tower having begun in the end of February or beginning of March 1405–6.

Pinkerton and others have been misled in this matter by the inaccurate dates assigned to certain entries regarding the Earl of Orkney cited from the "Rotulus Viagii" in Rymer's "Fœdera." James was entrusted by his father to the charge of the Earl of Orkney, who was captured with him off Flamborough Head; and as these entries[1] seemed to suggest that that Earl was a prisoner in England on the 19th August and 13th September 1405, it was inferred that he had been detained as well as the Prince, and that the capture could not have been much later than the date assigned to it by Wyntoun, Palm Sunday (12th April) 1405.[2] The editor having communicated his doubts regarding these entries to Mr Hardy, Deputy Keeper of Records, that gentleman most obligingly undertook a lengthened investigation regarding them, as well as a search for other entries in the English records throwing a light on the date of James's capture, the result of which was to confirm generally the view of the sequence of events expressed at the close of the Preface to the preceding volume, to establish beyond doubt the inaccuracy of Rymer's dates, and to throw considerable collateral light on the transactions of the time.[3]

Orkney, though in company with the Prince, had not been treated as a prisoner. He was one of thirteen persons who had, on the 30th January 1405–6, a safe conduct from Henry IV. to come to England and return to Scotland, terminable as soon as they should become hostages for the Earl of Douglas, who had been made prisoner at Shrewsbury.[1] It seems likely that the Earl of Orkney had availed himself of this passport to return home soon after the Prince's capture. A second passport was granted on 15th March following to him, in conjunction with Walter Haliburton of that ilk,[2] to determine, like the other, when the persons named in it became hostages for the Earl of Douglas. By means of it he probably returned to England; and the entries in the "Rotulus Viagii," whose real date is 1407, not 1405, show that the Earl of Orkney was in that year in England, not as a prisoner, but as a hostage for Douglas, and that he was relieved by his two brothers.

A payment of £120 in the Chamberlain's account rendered in March 1406–7, "pro expensis commissariorum missorum in Angliam pro negociis regni communibus semel ante mortem domini regis, et postea pro liberacione filii quondam domini regis,"[3] is so ambiguously worded that we cannot with certainty infer that there had been time before the King's death for an embassy to be sent to England to remonstrate against the capture.

At the time of the capture there was a nominal truce between the two countries, but one which was habitually and flagrantly violated on both sides. It did not prevent Arran, Lauderdale, and Teviotdale from being ravaged by the English, or Berwick from being burned by the Scots. A remarkable letter is in existence from James Douglas, Warden of the Marches, brother of the Earl of Douglas, and afterwards 7th Earl, to Henry IV., in which, in answer to a complaint by the King that Douglas's followers had in time of truce burned Berwick, the Warden rejoins that the English had previously killed many Scots, taken a number of their ships, ravaged the King's lands of Arran, destroyed his castle of Brodick, and burned his chapel.[1] In a memorandum appended to the customs' accounts of Edinburgh for 1407 and 1408, it appears that £23, 5s. 2d. were compulsorily taken by Douglas from the custumars of the place to defray the expenses incurred by him in burning Berwick.[2]

In September 1405, the English were anticipating and making preparations for an expected invasion by Albany,[3] and Henry was issuing a commission to treat with Donald, Lord of the Isles,[4] on whose assistance against the Scottish Crown the English kings were wont to reckon; facts which render extremely improbable the surmise of later historians, that the Prince's capture was the result of a friendly hint by Albany to Henry.

II.

On the June following Robert's death, Wyntoun informs us that a Council met at Perth, which, after recognising the title of the boy-king, conferred the regency on the late King's brother, Robert Duke of Albany, who, during a great part of the last two reigns, had exercised most of the royal functions as Guardian of the Realm and King's Lieutenant.[1] The proceedings of this Council not being extant, we are left in doubt whether the terms of the appointment give any warrant for the unusual form in which the Regent exercised his powers. It is generally considered of the essence of a regency that the government is carried on in the name of the Sovereign as the fountain of authority. In the case of all the numerous regencies which have existed in Scotland, except those of Robert and Murdach Dukes of Albany, the Regent governed in the name of the King, and the charters were granted by the minor or absent King and under his seal. But the charters during Albany's regency run in the name of Robert Duke of Albany, Earl of Fife and Menteith, and Governor of Scotland, and are granted under the Great Seal of his office, and dated in the year, not of the King's reign, but of the regency. The Exchequer accounts have similarly the heading "Scaccarium magnifici et prepotentis principis, domini Roberti ducis Albanie, comitis de Fife et de Menteth, et gubernatoris Scocie." In a letter to Henry IV. in 1410,[1] Albany assumes the style of Governor "Dei gracia," and speaks of his "subditi" of Scotland.

Two entries regarding the Regent's Great Seal occur in this volume. In Albany's account as Governor, audited in March 1408–9, £14 was allowed for silver for it, and for the cost of engraving it,[2] and in the following year part of a sum of £33, 6s. 8d. paid by the custumars of Aberdeen to the Bishop of Aberdeen is also said to be for silver for this Seal.[3] This very unique seal has failed to attract the attention that it deserves among the curious in seals, although specimens of it exist in various private repositories. It is not to be found in Henry Laing's valuable "Catalogue of Scottish Seals." In its obverse, excepting in the legend, it differs little from the Seals of Robert II. and Robert III,[4] having a similar equestrian figure in armour with the national insignia shown on a shield and repeated on the horse's caparison. The reverse, however, along with a general resemblance to the Seals of these two kings, has some notable peculiarities. The figure under a canopy occupying the chair of state, holds in his hand not a sceptre but a sword; and on his head in place of a royal diadem is a circlet surmounted by five balls, what in those days passed for a ducal coronet. The robes, if meant for the "insignia solis ducibus competencia et tradi consueta," mentioned in the account of the bestowal of the two dukedoms in the Chartulary of Moray,[1] do not visibly differ from the royal robes on the seals of the Roberts. There is, as in former Great Seals, on each side of the throne an armorial shield supported from behind by a grotesque animal; but the royal arms appear in only one of these shields, the other containing the coat of the earldom of Fife quartered with Stewart differenced by a label. The legend "Sigillum Roberti ducis Albanie gubernatoris Scocie," is in Gothic, not, as on all other Great Seals, in Roman characters.

On the 9th of February 1406–7, the league between Scotland and France was renewed at Paris in presence of Sir Walter Stewart of Ralstoun, William Lauder, Archdeacon of Lothian, and afterwards (1408) Bishop of Glasgow, John Gil, and John Leith;[2] and in the Chamberlain's account rendered in 1412 occurs a payment of £232 to Sir Walter Stewart, John Gray, and John of Leith, for the expenses of an embassy, either this or a subsequent one, to the Courts of France and Rome.[3]

For a year after Robert's decease, Albany united the function of Great Chamberlain with that of governor; and we have his account as Chamberlain in the audit of March 1406–7.[1] On 12th March 1406–7 he conferred the chamberlainship on the eldest son of his second marriage, John Stewart Earl of Buchan,[2] an appointment retained by him till his death in 1424, though during part of that time he was earning military renown abroad as commander of the Scots auxiliaries to the Dauphin, and could only act by deputy. In reward for his services at Baugé, the Earl of Buchan had the distinguished office of Constable of France conferred on him; and a few months after James's return to Scotland, he met his death at Verneuil. As Chamberlain of Scotland he seems to have acted entirely under the control of his father; in fact, the accounts show a curious division of the duties of the office between father and son. In the first year of Buchan's chamberlainship we find custumars, bailies, and sheriffs, making payments quite as frequently to the Governor or to his account as to the Chamberlain; and at the audit of March 1407–8, the Chamberlain's roll contains a separate account by Albany, with the payments in question on the debit side, and on the credit side his salary as Governor and in other capacities. In after years the arrangement was slightly different. The payments to the Governor in the burgh accounts were accompanied with a marginal indication that they were to be accounted for by the Chamberlain. They were entered in the Chamberlain's account, but separately from payments made directly to that officer or his deputies, the object being still doubtless to secure a preference for the Regent's income over all other claims on the revenue : and in the Chamberlain's account of 1410, the Governor's receipts and the payments to him are as completely separated from the Chamberlain's receipts and payments as when each rendered a separate account. In 1408 we find the greater part, and in 1409 and 1410 the whole, of the salary of the Chamberlain paid to Albany and not to his son.[1]

As Governor Albany had a salary of £1000, which, at first sometimes complained of as in arrear,[2] was afterwards regularly paid.[3] As Keeper of Stirling Castle he had an annuity of 200 marks,[4] and he had another 200 marks, which had been granted him from the customs of Linlithgow and Cupar, for retinue to the Duke of Rothesay.[5] A further annuity of £136 was paid to him in exchange for the abthania of Dull, a part of the Crown demesnes which had been granted or promised to him.[6] The revenues of the earldoms of

Fife and Menteith, judging by the accounts of them in the reign of James II., may be roughly estimated at £1200, bringing the Regent's income up to £2600: and he was besides allowed the custom of the wool, woolfells, and hides of his domestic establishments at Stirling and Falkland.[1]

Albany's character as a governor has been variously estimated. According to Wyntoun:[2]—

Bower also lauds his wisdom, patience, munificence, courage, temperance, and prudence, and describes him as restraining oppression where he could, though obliged to temporise when the offender was too powerful for the law.[1]

Pinkerton, on the other hand,[2] credits Albany with "an insatiate ambition, unrelenting cruelty, and its attendant cowardice, or at least an absolute defect of military fame, a contempt of the best human affections, a long practice in all the dark paths of art and dissimulation. . . . As fortune," he adds, "preserved his government from any signal unsuccess, so it would be an abuse of terms to bestow upon a wary management, which only regarded his own interest, the praise of political wisdom."

To govern Scotland in any fashion in those days required talent and resolution beyond the common, and the two last kings had found themselves unable to guide the helm of the state without the help of the more astute and energetic Albany. The Crown revenues had been dilapidated to an extent that made the King far poorer than many of his nobles. The greater magnates affected a royal state, had their own heralds and pursuivants, and a council of their vassals to advise them, held lightly by their allegiance to their Sovereign, and considered the laws of the land no further binding on them than suited their convenience. There were indeed but two ways in which a country situated as Scotland then was could have been ruled at all. One was by securing the persons and confiscating the estates of the nobles who acted as if they were above the law; the other, by purchasing, as far as possible, the support of these magnates, so as to exercise a restraining influence on them, and conniving at such injustice and oppression as could not be averted. The former course was that which cost James I. his life, the latter was that pursued by Albany.

Prominent among the great families that had emerged from the troubles of David's minority with a territorial power that could keep the Crown at bay was the house of Douglas; and its influence had been steadily growing throughout the half century preceding the period when this volume opens. The nephew of the "good Sir James," who was made an Earl in 1357, owned in his own right extensive territories in seven counties of Scotland, to which the domains of the earldom of Mar were added by his marriage with the Countess; and King Robert II. on his accession had to bargain for his friendship by bestowing one of his daughters in marriage on Douglas's eldest son. That son, the second Earl, died without lawful issue on the field of Otterburn: and the earldom of Douglas, now separated from that of Mar, went, in terms of an entail, to Sir Archibald Douglas, the natural son of Bruce's comrade in arms, one of the greatest warriors of his day, already owner of the extensive lordship of Galloway, to which he had added the fair barony of Bothwell by marriage with the widow of Sir Thomas of Moray.[1] In virtue of his military reputation and his vast domains, he occupied, if possible, a more prominent position than the two previous Earls of Douglas. He married his daughter to the Duke of Rothesay, and his son and heir to a daughter of Robert III. That son, Archibald fourth Earl, who was representative of the family during the regency of the Albanys, was twice made prisoner by the English, first at Homildon, where he was severely wounded and lost an eye, and afterwards at Shrewsbury, where, fighting side by side with his old antagonist Percy, he is said to have felled Henry IV. to the ground. In the lifetime of Robert III. so close an alliance is supposed to have existed between Albany and Douglas that they were suspected of having conspired together to bring about the death of the heir to the throne, who was nephew of the one and brother-in-law of the other. In 1407 Douglas was permitted to return to Scotland under an engagement to pay a ransom of 1000 marks; and at Inverkeithing, on the 20th June 1409, a solemn compact for mutual support and defence was entered into between him and the Governor.[1]

There is reason to believe that somewhat similar engagements existed between the Earl of Douglas and others of the nobility, including Alexander Stewart Earl of Mar; but the agreement with Douglas did not prevent the Regent from receiving into favour the border Earl who was Douglas's chief rival, and who had been for some years in open revolt. George Earl of March had repaid the Duke of Rothesay's breach of matrimonial engagement to his daughter by renouncing his allegiance, and seeking protection at the court of Henry. His expatriation had brought on Scotland a succession of disastrous invasions, one of them headed by the English king in person, another culminating in the defeat of Homildon. Deeming the friendship of this nobleman far from unimportant, Albany entered into negotiations for his return. But the principal lands of his earldom, with his castle of Dunbar, had fallen into the hands of the Earl of Douglas, who could only be induced to part with them on obtaining Lochmaben and Annandale in their place. The last named territories were accordingly added to the possessions of the house of Douglas, by a charter containing a reversion to March and his heirs on failure of the heirs male of the rival house. March seems to have returned to Scotland in 1409, and in 1410 we find him called along with the Earls of Douglas and of Mar into the councils of the Regent, to deliberate on the measures to be adopted to resist the threatened invasion of the Lord of the Isles.[1]

The customs' accounts bring us into frequent contact with one class of these enormities of the powerful, with which, according to Bower, the Regent had to temporise, and enable us to estimate its extent. In the reign of Robert III. we found the Duke of Rothesay occasionally overawing and even imprisoning the collectors of the customs in order to extort money from them, and a small sum claimed as due to the Duchess of Rothesay is on one occasion recorded to have been taken by violence from the custumars of Linlithgow.[2] But under the regency we are brought into continual contact with this description of lawlessness. It was an every day occurrence for the more considerable earls or barons, it might be on the plea of a claim on the government for some public service performed, or often without any such excuse, to ship the produce of their estates duty free, in defiance of the collectors of customs, and to aid merchants who were under their protection in doing the same. Nor did these personages scruple, when it suited them, directly to rob and plunder the custumars, and to incarcerate them till they disbursed whatever balance they had in hand. Not unfrequently the custom was taken from the merchants without being allowed to find its way into the hands of the custumars at all, the magnate in question taking possession of the tron, and himself granting the cocket necessary for the shipment of the wool or hides. The chief offenders of this sort were, in the first place, the confederate whose acts the Regent had bound himself to uphold, the Earl of Douglas, then his brother James Douglas, lord of Balveny, Abercorn, and Aberdour in Buchan, Warden of the Marches, afterwards Earl of Avondale, and eventually seventh Earl of Douglas, the earl's brother-in-law, Walter of Haliburton, husband of the Duchess of Rothesay, and his cousin[1] Sir William Crawford of Haining and Ferme, who, in terms of a compact or indenture with Douglas, discharged in his place, during his absence in England, the duties of Keeper of Edinburgh

[1] So designed as witness to a charter by the Earl of Douglas.—"Antiquities of shires of Aberdeen and Banff" (Spalding Club), ii. p. 376.

Castle.[1] Next to them the most prominent delinquents were the son and heir of Sir William of Borthwick, whom we find towards the close of the regency Captain of Edinburgh Castle,[2] and James Dundas of Dundas.

A slight inspection of the customs' accounts of Edinburgh and Linlithgow—the burghs whose exports bulked most largely—will present a strange picture of the increasing extent to which the revenue was plundered from year to year.

In the first audit after King Robert's death, the custumars of Edinburgh depone to £23, 5s. 2½d. having been taken by violence from them by James, brother of the Earl of Douglas, he granting them however a receipt for it.[3] At the next Exchequer, that of March 1407–8, the sum in question is carried over as arrears; it is explained to be claimed by Douglas for his expenses in setting fire to Berwick, and at the close of the account is enumerated, along with further sums, amounting in all to nearly £100, as having been forcibly taken on various pretexts. These include forty marks laid claim to by James Douglas, on the plea of an alleged promise by the Regent that he should have the relief of his lands of Aberdour; forty marks taken by Sir William Crawford, as salary due to the then absent Earl of Douglas as Keeper of Edinburgh Castle the year of Homildon; and twenty marks said falsely ("licet non sit") to be due to Robert of

Crawford, brother to Sir William, as Constable of Edinburgh Castle, besides 17s. 9d. of custom which James of Dundas refuses to pay.[1]

By another year the Earl of Douglas has returned from England; and the audit held in May 1409, a few months before the date of his compact with the Regent, exhibits a decided growth in the extent and effrontery of the system of pillage. Twenty-three sacks of wool have been shipped duty free in defiance of the authority of the custumars of Edinburgh by Sir William Crawford and certain other persons,[2] and the same custumars claim to be credited with various further sums, including those already mentioned, £133, 6s. 8d. taken by Crawford, and £465, 12s. 10d. by the Earl of Douglas,—in all £708, 2s. 1d.—as having been extorted by violence, and in part by the compulsitor of imprisonment at Crawford's instance in Edinburgh Castle. The auditors refer the matter to the Regent,[3] and the result of the reference is seen in the next Edinburgh account, namely, the exoneration of the custumars, and an engagement by the Regent to admonish the Earl against similar doings in future.[4]

Between the audits of 1411 and 1412 the Earl of Douglas was absent in Flanders. Conformably to the Governor's decree, the arrears alluded to are

[4] Page 118 "Et quod ipse dominus gubernator loquatur cum domino comite de Douglas super illa materia, ne de cetero talia fiant pro quibus pendebat dicta summa."

written off: but the Edinburgh account of 1412 exhibits a new score, more limited in amount, in respect of which the Governor has again directed the auditors to exonerate the custumars, as acting under compulsion. This arrear, amounting to £43, 11s., is described as having arisen from Borthwick and James Douglas, whose wool had been arrested for payment of duty, having broken arrest and shipped their goods in defiance of the custumars; and Borthwick, in confederacy with Sir John of St Clair, having compelled a Flemish merchant to pay to him the custom of his goods.[1]

Before 1413 Douglas has returned from his Flemish expedition and presumably received the Regent's admonition. At the audit of that year, however, we find him both refusing to pay the custom on his wool, estimated at £69, 6s. 8d., and carrying off the whole balance in the hands of the custumars of Edinburgh, amounting to £634, 10s. 11d.[2] Next year also the Earl "per se et ministros suos" took by violence the whole balance of £1339, 5s. 9d.[3] In 1415 the fresh depredations amounted to £1254, 4s. 2½d., and a memorandum under Douglas's hand was produced, showing who the "ministri" were who plundered the customs under his authority. They included Walter of Haliburton, the Earl of Orkney, James of Douglas, William of Borthwick, Sir William Douglas of

Drumlanrig, and the steward of the Earl's house, John of Livingston ; it appearing that an additional £240 had been directly taken by Douglas from the merchants.[1]

In 1416 the gross custom of Edinburgh is returned as only £2047 : and there is a detailed enumeration of persons who habitually refuse to pay custom, among whom are George of Lauder, Robert of Lauder, and Robert of Borthwick. Some of them, namely, William Young of the Castle, Robert of Niddry, and John Watson dwelling at Holyroodhouse, are classed under the description of "communis asportator lane, pellium, et coriorum." The Earl of Douglas takes at his own hand £490 to indemnify himself for his expenses in March Days and border raids, and Haliburton £233, 6s. 8d., alleged to be due for his wife's pension. As to both classes of depredators there is the usual reference to the Governor and exoneration of the custumars. There is, however, an indication of some attempt being made to check the evasion of custom by smaller persons, in a payment of £5 to the "custodes navium," and £5, 9s. 5d. to the clerk of cocket for extra labour and diligence.[2]

That the habitual evasion of custom went on increasing will be inferred from the Edinburgh account of 1417, where the gross custom had fallen to £1336, 5s. The custumars, pressed by the auditors to disclose who the evaders of custom were, gave the names among others of the Lord of Seton, Sir William Crawford, and George of Lauder. George of Lauder and Richard of Wyntoun, it appeared, shipped woolfells under a cocket of North Berwick, which the custumars of that burgh had granted under compulsion, though the fells in question had never been entered. Like things, the custumars add, are done every day by many other persons whom they cannot specify.[1] Of the balance in the custumars' hands we find £562, 4s. 6d. illegally carried off by the Earl of Douglas, Haliburton, and the Master of Douglas, the offence in the last named instance including breach of arrest.[2]

In 1418 the gross customs have diminished to £1098, 5s. 4d., of which £378, 18s. 3½d. are taken possession of on the part of the Earl of Douglas by his steward, John of Livingston: and we have again a schedule furnished to the auditors of habitual evaders of duty.[3]

In the latest account of the Edinburgh custumars rendered in Albany's lifetime, audited in July 1420, and including two years, with the gross receipts still diminishing, it appeared that custumars, tronar, and clerk of cocket had been interdicted from exercising their functions from the previous Martinmas, that the collection of customs had been delegated to William of Borthwick, the Captain of the Castle, himself a notorious transgressor, and that while the Earl of Douglas had carried off £872, 12s. 1d., a further sum had been appropriated by Borthwick.[1]

The customs' accounts of Linlithgow tell a similar story. The payment of custom was largely evaded, and the custumars were year by year robbed of the money which they had collected, the arch-offenders being James of Douglas and Walter of Haliburton. The former on one occasion takes the custumars to Abercorn, and places them in durance there till they disburse the sum demanded;[2] and at other times overawes the merchants, compelling them by threats and imprisonment to pay custom to him instead of to the proper collector.[3] In 1420 Haliburton both compels the merchants to make him the recipient of the custom, and, by imprisoning the custumars in the island castle of Fidra, extorts from them the sum of £235, 8s. 3d.[4] In connection with all these delinquencies we have the same futile reference to the Governor as in the Edinburgh accounts.

This wholesale pillage was the price which Albany had to pay for the support and countenance of the Earl of Douglas, without a good understanding with whom he would probably have found the task of ruling Scotland impossible.

III.

A curious episode of Albany's regency with which the Exchequer accounts bring us in contact, was the harbouring by him of an impostor given out to be King Richard of England.

While the mode and circumstances of the death of Richard II. are obscure, it is certain that he died or was murdered in Pontefract Castle in January or February 1399–1400. Henry IV. had a short time previously suppressed a rather formidable insurrection organised under the pretext that the ex-King had escaped from prison; and a priest to whom, on the ground of a strong resemblance in figure and feature, the rôle had been assigned of personating the deposed monarch, suffered death as a traitor. It was probably in anticipation of the possibility of rumours of Richard being alive and at large becoming again the basis of conspiracies that Henry caused his body to be brought from Pontefract to London, exhibited at every considerable town by the way, and displayed with still greater publicity at St Pauls and Westminster Abbey.

But neither Father Maudelaine's execution nor the exposure of Richard's corpse proved an effectual barrier against the appearance of a second pseudo-Richard. The new personator was one Thomas Warde, or Thomas of Trumpington, described as a fool or jester, and who like Maudelaine bore some personal resemblance to the late King: but the principal agent in bringing him forward was one William Serle, who had been groom of the robes to Richard, and a willing tool in the murder of the Duke of Gloucester and other unprincipled acts of the late reign, and who appears to have possessed himself of Richard's Signet. Serle's position as a proscribed outlaw, the publicity with which Richard's corpse had been exhibited, and Warde's presumable inability to sustain the part assigned him, were reasons which may have made it convenient to fix the imposture as far as possible from London : and the pretended Richard, who was originally an instrument in the hands of the supporters of Edmund Mortimer, the true heir of the Plantagenets, is first heard of in the remoter parts of Scotland. Two instruments printed in the "Fœdera"[1] bear that in June 1402 a person giving himself out to be the deceased King was in Scotland, and that Serle was with him, and require the sheriffs to arrest all persons who had had a hand in spreading the rumour that Richard was alive. In March 1403–4 Henry, when granting an amnesty to political offenders, excepted Serle and Thomas Warde of Trumpington ;[2] and soon afterwards Serle, approaching too near the English frontier, was entrapped by Sir William Clifford, and suffered a traitor's death.

The counterfeit King of England was, according to Bower, first discovered in the kitchen of the Lord of the Isles, and sent to Robert III., at whose expense he was maintained, and after his death at that of Albany.[1] He can only, however, have come into the hands of the Scottish government very shortly before the death of Robert. The Exchequer accounts recognise him as King Richard of England, and show that he was a pensioner of Scotland from the date of Robert's death, and that the Regent himself advanced 100 marks yearly for his maintenance. During the last two years of Warde's life his allowance seems to have been discontinued: but on his death, which took place in Stirling Castle in 1419, he was buried in the Dominican Church of Stirling; and in the Latin inscription over his tomb[2] he was designed "Anglie Richardus rex."

The rolls contain four entries regarding the supposed Richard. The first occurs in a memorandum at the close of the account of Albany as Governor rendered in 1408,[3] to the effect that the Governor has neither asked nor received at present any allowance for his advances to King Richard of England, as the state of the revenue would not admit of his so doing. The second and third entries are in the accounts of the Chamberlain rendered in 1414 and 1415,[4] and to the same general effect, but date the expenses from the death of the late King: and the fourth entry, in the Chamberlain's account rendered in 1417,[1] adds that Albany's advances "pro custodia regis Ricardi Anglie" for the period of eleven years from the death of the late King, are estimated by the auditors at 100 marks yearly, or in all £733, 6s. 8d. This sum of £733, 6s. 8d. forms part of an item of overexpenditure, towards which a part payment is made in a subsequent account,[2] and which reappears in the successive Chamberlain's accounts down to the close of the regency of Duke Murdach.

The business-like character of these entries nearly worked conviction on Mr Tytler, that the person to whom they referred was the actual King Richard escaped from Pontefract; but the arguments with which Mr Riddell combated that historian's "Remarks on the Death of Richard II." are unanswerable. These may be generally described as being based on the publicity of the exhibition of Richard's body, the remoteness of the scene, and the identification (due to Mr Riddell's researches) of the personator; as well as the conviction of the French King, then in intimate intercourse with Scotland, of the reality of Richard's death, evinced by his disbanding the armament which he had collected to vindicate the cause of his son-in-law, and his consent — given at the very time when this imposture was going on—to the marriage of his daughter, Richard's widow, to the Duke of Orleans.[1]

Mr Tytler, considering this pretender to have been the real Richard II., surmised that he was kept and maintained in Scotland with the assent of Henry; and holding also that it was by Albany's manœuvres that James had been captured and kept in England, he looked on the English King and Scottish Regent as playing off their prisoners against each other. But holding, as we must do, that the Scottish Richard was an impostor, and knowing, as we do from a letter to Henry from the Archbishop of Canterbury,[2] that it was in defiance of Henry's remonstrances that Warde was protected by the Scottish Regent, it is difficult for us to believe in any such secret understanding as is involved in the supposition of James having been first captured and then detained in captivity through the deliberate intrigues of Albany. Had such intrigues existed, one would have expected a dread of their exposure to induce such a subservience to England as is at variance with the treatment of the pretended Richard and many other acts of the regency.

In the Chamberlain's account of 1408, we find Albany in communication with Owen Glendower, and considerable sums are said to have been expended by him at various times in the entertainment of Welsh ambassadors.[1]

That one who had been long accustomed to rule, and who as Regent was governing with so near an approach to royal authority, looked with misgiving on the prospect of surrendering his power to another, is likely enough: but the Exchequer accounts contain no direct corroboration of the common assertion of modern historians, that Albany made every effort to obtain the release of his son Murdach, and threw every impediment which he could in the way of the return of his nephew the King. Numerous payments occur for the cost of missions to England for the King's liberation; but in only one instance is the deliverance of the Regent's son as well as of the King specifically mentioned as an object of the mission. At the audit of March 1406–7, £120 are paid to envoys sent both before the King's death and after, for the liberation of his son.[2] A payment of £20 occurs in the audit of May 1409 to the Earl of Orkney, described as "laboranti pro negociis serenissimi principis filii regis nostri,"[3] a designation perhaps calculated to provoke comment. In the accounts of 1412, we have two payments of £130 each to Sir John Stewart of Lorn, Master Robert De Lany, provost of St Andrews, and Sir John of Busby, envoys to England for the King's liberation:[4] and it

[2] Page 39.
[3] Page 102.
[4] Pages 142, 163.

is in one of these entries that the mission is said to have had for its object the ransom of the King and Sir Murdach Stewart.[1] In 1414 and 1415 we find Sir Robert Maxwell of Calderwood and the same De Lany receiving sums amounting to £220 in defrayment of their expenses on two if not three embassies to negotiate for the King's return, while £20 were paid for three journeys of a herald who accompanied them to London:[2] and other missions unmentioned in the Exchequer accounts will be alluded to below.

The secret motives of actions are not always what are averred in State papers and public accounts; and those who are disposed to judge harshly of Albany, will of course assume that his envoys had private instructions at variance with the avowed purpose of their embassies. The relations, however, subsisting between the King and the Earl of Orkney, the chosen companion of his voyage to England, show that in one instance at least an envoy was employed by the Regent, whose sympathy with the avowed object of his mission was beyond question.

The town of Jedburgh, which from the time of David II. had been in possession of the English, was recaptured by the inhabitants of Teviotdale early in 1409. In order to prevent the enemy from regaining their hold on the Castle, it became necessary to level it with the ground; but the extreme solidity of the masonry made this an arduous work. Bower informs us that at a council held at Perth, it was proposed that a tax should be levied for that purpose; but that the suggestion was negatived by Albany, who declared that if he sanctioned the raising of taxes he would deserve the curses of the poor;[1] and he ordered the sum required to be paid out of the customs. We accordingly find two payments of £20 each made from the customs of Edinburgh for the demolition of this fortress, one of them to James Douglas, who was then Warden of the Marches.[2]

Among domestic events of the same date Bower mentions the destruction of the town of Cupar by fire:[3] and the accounts of 1412 tell us of an expenditure of 31s. 8d. on the tron of that town, said to have been destroyed by a sudden conflagration;[4] in addition to which a similar outlay of £4, 6s. appears at the audit of 1418.[5]

IV.

The most important event of Albany's regency was the rebellion raised by the Lord of the Isles, in support of a claim made by him to the earldom of Ross. By the death of Alexander Leslie Earl of Ross, about the year 1406,[6] the succession devolved on his daughter Euphemia, who was weak and sickly in constitution; and she, probably at the instigation of her maternal grandfather the Regent, became a nun. Her heir-presumptive was her paternal aunt, married to Donald Lord of the Isles: and the insular potentate, on the plea that the Countess, having taken this step, must be regarded dead in law, claimed the earldom as his by right, proceeded to seize it by force, and anticipating the Regent's opposition, he collected an army of 10,000 men, and prepared to carry havoc into the settled districts of Scotland. After holding a rendezvous at Inverness, he advanced southwards with his marauding host, when his course was arrested in the lowlands of Aberdeenshire by Alexander Stewart Earl of Mar.

Alexander Stewart's career had been a strange one. A natural son of the "Wolf of Badenach," and a leader of freebooters like his father, he was universally believed to have been the instigator of a murderous attack made on the brother of the Queen and husband of the Countess of Mar, in his own castle; after which he stormed the widowed Countess in her fortress of Kildrummy, and compelled her to marry him. This marriage suddenly raised him from a captain of robbers to be one of the greatest men in Scotland. The Countess conferred on him a liferent right to her earldom, which Robert III. confirmed, in breach of an engagement under which he had come at a time when Isabel was the wife of his own brother-in-law, Sir Malcolm Drummond, to recognise no resignation made by the Countess Isabel to the prejudice of her heir-presumptive, the wife of Sir Thomas Erskine. Alexander Stewart's character changing with his altered circumstances, he became —outwardly at least—a supporter of law and order. That a bond for mutual support existed between him and the Regent, we know by an allusion to it in an indenture between him and Duke Murdach. In 1406 he distinguished himself in England by a passage of arms with Edmund (Holland) Earl of Kent;[1] and Wyntoun's concluding chapter represents him as heading a body of auxiliaries to the Duke of Burgundy, who in 1408 quelled a rebellion in Liège, and settled the Bishop-elect in his See.[2] Becoming the same year a widower,[3] he took for second wife a noble lady of the Low Countries. The receipts for his pensions[4] show that his absences from Scotland were not of very long duration. In 1410 we find him called into the councils of the Regent to advise what should be done in the present emergency,[5] and in the following year he was again in Scotland when the island Lord was advancing southwards. The inhabitants of Buchan, Mar, Garioch, Mearns, and [4] In right of his first wife he drew an annuity of 200 marks from the customs of Haddington, originally granted to her brother the second Earl of Douglas (pages 36, 69, 70, 101, 131, 163, 211, 237, 264, 287, 335, 375; also vol. iii. pages 293, note, 643), and during the Countess's lifetime he drew a pension from the customs of Aberdeen granted to her murdered first husband (pages 15, 41).

Angus, with Robert Davidson the provost, and a body of stout burghers of Aberdeen, marshalled under the Earl of Mar to resist Donald's advance; and at Harlaw in the Garioch, on the 24th July 1411, a sanguinary battle was fought, with great disadvantage of numbers on the part of the lowlanders, the result of which was that the Lord of the Isles, though unconquered, left Mar master of the field, the slaughter on both sides being so great that many families lost not only their head but every scion of the house.

To anticipate the renewal of the struggle, the Regent, as soon as he could muster a sufficient force, marched northwards to the Castle of Dingwall, captured and garrisoned it, and overran the whole of Ross. The insular chief fell back on his distant fastnesses; but next summer he was again attacked by Albany, and by a treaty concluded at Polgilb (the modern Lochgilp) he had to abandon his pretentions to the earldom of Ross, make submission to the Scottish Crown, and give hostages for the observance of peace. In June 1415 the nun-Countess resigned the earldom in dispute to her grandfather the Regent, who reconveyed it to her with remainder to her maternal uncle, John Earl of Buchan, the Chamberlain.

Those who think worst of the Regent allow that he acted with spirit and promptitude in this emergency; and, notwithstanding his alleged rapacity, it is observable that he had no allowance from the national Exchequer for the expenses either of the expedition to Ross, or of that to Polgilb,[1] which, in the memoranda allusive to them, are placed side by side with the payments to the pretended Richard, but are not, like them, carried forward to future accounts as unpaid debts.

The Earl of Mar was, as might be expected, generously dealt with. At the first audit after Harlaw, that of June 1412, he was paid £122, 17s. 4d. by the Chamberlain,[2] and got £200 from the customs of Aberdeen.[3] £24 were in the following year paid to various captains of northern parts of Ross,[4] and £10 to Kenneth Murchirson of Ross,[5] for their labours in restoring quiet to the country.

One of the means adopted for introducing order into the Highlands was the reconstruction on a larger scale of the important Castle of Inverness, on whose site a stronghold had existed since the time of Malcolm Canmore. The new buildings were erected under the superintendence of the Earl of Mar, and the expenditure connected with the constructing and garrisoning of them is given in the Exchequer accounts in considerable detail, the items enumerated amounting in all to nearly £640.[6]

[6] At the audit of 1412, in addition to the already mentioned payments to the Earl of Mar, he received £100 from the Chamberlain, and £100 from the customs of Aberdeen, for the construction of a fortress at Inverness for the defence of the country against the Lord of the Isles (pages 145, 163). £32, 10s. 3d. were at the same time paid for lime, victuals, and carriage of timber to the said fortress (page 163). In 1413 £25, 6s. 8½d. are paid to the Earl

The rolls contain no allusion to an important event of the year following Harlaw, the foundation of the University of St Andrews.

In March 1412–13, Henry v. of England succeeded his father, and the liberation of Murdach Stewart shortly followed. Just before Henry IV.'s death we find a passport granted to Sir Walter Stewart of Ralstoun and John of Leith to treat for Murdach's return to Scotland;[1] a safe conduct was soon afterwards given to Murdach's brother, John Earl of Buchan;[2] and about the beginning of the year 1416 the young Earl of Northumberland, who had been honourably treated in Scotland, and educated at St Andrews under the surveillance of the Bishop, was exchanged for the Regent's son.[3]

As James approached to mature age, and favourable reports of him were brought by his subjects who had visited him in England, there naturally by the custumars of Inverness towards the repair of the Castle (page 173); and £52, 11s. 3d. in 1414 by the Chamberlain (page 211). The customs' account of the same burgh in 1415 contains an enumeration of items of outlay by the Earl of Mar connected with a tower built by order of the council in the Castle of Inverness, mounting up to £288, 2s. 9d., and including £66, 13s. 4d. paid to John of Soulis, the master mason (lauthomo principali), meal, salt, marts, payments to military retainers (servientes) and to the master of works, food and wages of six men keeping the castle, and £8 for the table of Alexander Murchirson and his brother Ruthery (Roderick), malefactors imprisoned there for the good of the state (pp. 227, 228), probably sons of the head of the clan of the Mathesons. In the Inverness account of 1416 occur further expenses for said tower, including £10 to John of Soulis for making "unum turnpyke et duos turrites," and £12, 12s. for the maintenance of nine prisoners for sixteen weeks, and amounting in all to £38, 13s. 1d. (page 255). In the Chamberlain's account of the last named year, £20 are paid to the Earl of Mar for victualling ships sent to northern parts against the islanders (page 265).

arose a longing for his return; and soon after Henry's accession we have the two or three already mentioned missions of Maxwell and De Lany, who had English safe conducts of date 23d November 1413, and 8th May and 28th June 1414.[1] Other Scotsmen of influence had passports to visit England in connection with the negotiations for the King's release, including Walter Bishop of Brechin, William Lord of Graham, Alexander Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, John of St Clair, and Sir William Cockburn.[2] But after it seemed to have been arranged between Henry and the Scottish Council that James should visit Scotland, leaving a sufficient number of hostages behind him to ensure the payment of a penalty of 100,000 marks should he not return within a given time, some unknown cause, which modern writers have conjectured to be the intrigues of Albany with the English King, led to the negotiations being broken off.[3]

Albany's conduct a few months later makes it

[3] Copies or original drafts exist in the General Register House of letters sent about this date by James through a confidential chaplain to Albany, the Earls of Douglas and March, Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, Sir John Montgomery, and other Scottish magnates, in which Cockburn and Sir Archibald Edmonstone are mentioned as having been bearers of former letters from the King. While James describes Henry V. as "more gracious than I can say or write," he writes of Albany as requiring to be stirred up "to do truely his debt for our deliverance."

difficult to believe that it was to oblige him, and in deference to his wishes, that Henry retracted his promise to the Scottish King: it seems more natural to attribute what took place to Henry's discovery of the existence of negotiations unfriendly to him between Scotland and France. In the Chamberlain's account of 1415, the ambassadors of France are mentioned as present at the Exchequer audit;[1] and an extant letter of Henry v.[2] shows that a secret correspondence was going on between Albany and the Duke of Orleans, then a prisoner in England. While Henry was absent in France, an expedition was undertaken against Roxburgh and Berwick, which turned out so unfortunate and inglorious as to be afterwards remembered as the "Foul Raid."

V.

Bower and subsequent historians generally assert that Robert Duke of Albany died on the 3d September 1419:[3] but the Exchequer accounts[4] show that he was alive in July 1420; he granted a charter at Falkland on 4th August 1420;[5] and in all probability the actual date of his death was 3d September 1420. He was succeeded in the regency by his eldest son. As the Parliamentary proceedings of this period are lost, the conclusion which has sometimes been drawn from the absence of any direct contemporary mention of the meeting of the Estates, that Duke Murdach usurped the office of Governor without sanction of the Estates, seems scarcely warrantable.

Murdach Duke of Albany had neither his father's ambition nor his talent for ruling men. Outwardly he followed the precedents set by his father. He granted Crown charters under his Great Seal, and held in his own name his first Exchequer in July 1421, and his second Exchequer in July 1422. The larger part of the Chamberlain's receipts in his time are said to be "ex parte domini gubernatoris."[1] He had, like his father, his annual fee of £1000 as Governor, 200 marks as Keeper of Stirling Castle, and £136 in substitution for the abthania of Dull: and, in addition to the annuity of 100 marks which he had been receiving since 1393 from the customs of Aberdeen, he fell heir to his father's annuity of 300 marks from the customs of Linlithgow, Cupar, and Aberdeen, both of them pensions which had been granted for the consideration of retinue to the late Duke of Rothesay.

A curious indenture was entered into between Duke Murdach and the Earl of Mar on 16th November 1420, a copy of which has been preserved in Sir James Balfour's collections.[2] The Earl becomes

"man of speciale feale and reteneu" to Murdach, saving his allegiance to the King: and Murdach bestows on him half the profits of the office of Justiciary of the north, with half of the rents of Badenach, Urquhart, and Strathavon, and gives his letter to be "steadhaldand" to him after the tenor of the letter granted by his father. Alexander Stewart, it must be remembered, was a mere liferenter: but by this indenture he is to infeft his (natural) son, Sir Thomas Stewart, in the earldom, and the infeftment is to be confirmed by the Governor; a reversion being at the same time stipulated for, failing Sir Thomas and his heirs, to the Governor and his heirs, and a further condition being that the Earl of Mar is to aid the Governor in getting a confirmation by the King of this questionable transaction. The Regent further engages to prevent a marriage which is in contemplation between his son Walter and the daughter of Sir Robert Erskine; no doubt with the idea that such an alliance might endanger the contemplated encroachment on the rights of that lady's father, in whom the fee of the earldom was vested.[1]

[1] Walter Stewart in this as in other matters asserted his independence of his father. A few months later he obtained a dispensation to marry the lady in question (Andrew Stuart's "History of the Stewarts," p. 451), a document which indicates that there is an error in the commonly received Erskine genealogy. Walter Stewart and Janet Erskine are there said to stand to each other in the third degree of consanguinity on both sides. Were the recognised Erskine pedigree correct, they would be in the second and third degree, or, in modern phraseology, first cousins once removed, Walter being grandson of Robert Duke of Albany, and Janet his great-granddaughter through her mother, said to be

That Murdach had, like his father, bound himself to uphold the acts of the Earl of Douglas we do not positively know: but the same wholesale appropriation of the customs continued. At the audit of 1421, £803, 14s. 5½d.—more than two-thirds of the gross customs of Edinburgh—were carried off by the Earl of Douglas "pro transitu suo in Anglia,"[1] the allusion being probably to a raid of Douglas into England narrated by Bower, in which he burned the town of Alnwick.[2] At the Exchequer of 1422, within £50 of the whole gross custom, or £1108, 9s. 4½d., is said to have been carried off by Douglas or his servants, partly to pay pensions, and partly for himself, by permission, it is believed, of the Governor.[3] At the same audit it appeared that the already mentioned eldest son of the Governor, a daughter of Robert Stewart of Lorn by Duke Robert's daughter. In the "Lives of the Lindsays," vol. i. p. 105, note, is given, from the Mar charter chest, the substance of an agreement between the first Earl of Crawford and Sir Thomas Erskine, of date 1400, a condition of which is the marriage of a daughter of the Earl with his son Robert. If this marriage took place, and Janet were its issue, Walter Stewart would have been in exactly the degree of consanguinity stated in the dispensation. Thus:—

Robert II.

1. Robert Duke of Albany.	1. Countess of Crawford.
2. Murdach Duke of Albany.	2. — Lindsay m. Robert Lord Erskine.
3. Walter Stewart.	3. Janet Erskine.

The manuscript Mar genealogy compiled by George Erskine, bailie of Alloa, and produced in the late Mar Peerage claim, differs from the ordinary account in representing the wife of Robert Lord Erskine (Earl of Mar), and mother of his family, to have been a daughter of the Earl of Crawford.

Sir Walter Stewart of Fife, had seized the custumars of Linlithgow, and kept them in durance in the fortress of Dumbarton, of which he was Keeper, till they surrendered to him the sum of £15, 10s. 0½d. : and the auditors decreed that this sum should be set off against his pension of the following year.[1]

But before the next audit the rule of the Albanys had come to a close. The elder Albany had—as Bower says of him—restrained a great deal of wrongdoing where powerful interests did not stand in the way : and his rule, with all its faults, had been by no means unpopular. There was, on the other hand, a universal discontent with the misgovernment of his son : and the desire for the Sovereign's return was daily becoming stronger, and was participated in by the Regent himself and the Earl of Douglas, who, it must be remembered, was brother-in-law of James I.

But the relations between Scotland and France were an obstacle to negotiations for this end. In 1419 the Dauphin, in his extremity, had begged the assistance of his ally, and obtained the aid of a body of 7000 auxiliaries, headed by John Earl of Buchan. It was doubtless chiefly with the view of detaching these Scots from the French service that Henry in 1421 took James with him to France, entering in the first place into an agreement that he should, on certain conditions, be restored to his people three months after the return of both from abroad. It may perhaps have been with the hope of aiding this arrangement that the Earl of Douglas, who took an active part in the negotiations for James's return, entered on 30th May 1421 into an otherwise rather inexplicable agreement to aid the English King with 200 men-at-arms and 200 archers.[1] But the attempt to detach the Scots from their allies was a failure: the auxiliaries would not regard as binding any commands their Sovereign might issue regarding their relations with France so long as he was a prisoner. Douglas himself soon afterwards joined the auxiliaries in France, was there made Duke of Touraine, and fell at Verneuil. James, however, when in France, was, with Henry's sanction, visited by various of his subjects, as appears from passports granted in October 1421 and February 1421–22 to Lord Gordon, Sir Alexander Forbes, the Abbot of Paisley, and others.[2]

The death of Henry v. in France paved the way for James's return. Numerous passports began to be granted to Scotsmen of influence to visit their Sovereign in England, and treat for his release:[3] and a council held at Inverkeithing on the 19th August 1423 appointed an embassy for the same purpose, consisting of the Chancellor, the Earl of March, James Douglas of Balveny, the Abbots of Cambus-kenneth and Balmerinoch, Sir Patrick Dunbar of Bele, Sir Robert Lauder of Edrington, and others.[1] The absence of any allusion to these missions in the Exchequer accounts, if we except four payments, amounting in all to £2 to Dougal (of Drummond), the King's chaplain,[2] is perhaps sufficiently explained by the gap which exists in these accounts between July 1421 and June 1424.

It was eventually agreed that the King should be restored on condition of £40,000 (60,000 marks) being paid within the next six years, by half-yearly instalments, for the cost of his maintenance in England;[3] for which sum obligations were to be given by the burghs of Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee, and Aberdeen, the Earls of Moray, Crawford, and other leading Scottish nobles becoming hostages: and it was also stipulated that the King was to contract a marriage with some high-born English lady, in respect of which 10,000 marks of the ransom would be passed from as dowry.[4]

The lady fixed on was Joan of Beaufort, daughter of John Earl of Somerset—John of Gaunt's son by Katherine Swynford—to whom he had, when a prisoner in Windsor Castle, formed a romantic attachment, the history of which he has related in [3] It has been said that the English government avoided calling their claim ransom money, as James had been illegally captured in time of peace: but in Turyne's account the subsidy imposed is expressly said to be "pro redemcione . . . domini nostri regis."—Page 672.

"The Kingis Quhair," who continued his helper and comforter in good and evil fortune, and stood by him at the dismal close of his life.[1] Their marriage took place in March 1423–4: and the hostages having, as arranged, come to Durham, the King was conducted from thence in state into his own dominions on 9th April 1424, amid the acclamations of his people.

VI.

If the English government is chargeable with a breach of international law in the capture of the King of Scots, and with avarice in the terms exacted for his surrender, it must be allowed that Henry IV. and V. did all justice to James in the matter of education, and afforded him full opportunity for the development of his natural talents, which were undoubtedly of a high order. James returned home a scholar, a poet, and an artist, and skilled in every knightly accomplishment. He had seen the art of war as practised under the greatest commander of the age. He had studied English institutions with the view of improving those of Scotland; and, when he entered on his career as Sovereign, it was with a resolve to do his utmost to remedy the disorders of his country, and to cause the Crown and the law to be respected.

[1] The editor must be allowed to express his dissent from the following passage in Riddell's "Peerage and Consistorial Law," (p. 262). "There is reason to think that the affection of James I. for his attractive Queen, Jean of Beaufort, may possibly not have been undivided: for in an Exchequer roll of his son James II., comprehending the period from June 21st 1458 to July 1st 1460, we find mention made of a small payment out of the rents of Traboyagh in Carrick, granted 'per dominum regem fratri suo Jacobo Stewart.' Of this individual, whom I think we may hold to be illegitimate, the above is the only notice I have found." It is seldom that our greatest legal and genealogical antiquary can be charged with making a rash or inadvertent statement. Mr Riddell, however, has shown no reason, and there seems to be none, for supposing the James Stewart here mentioned to be other than the uterine brother of James II., son of Joan of Beaufort by her second husband the "Black Knight of Lorn," and afterwards Earl of Buchan.

One of his first acts was to order the arrest of Sir Walter Stewart, eldest son of the late Regent, Malcolm Fleming of Cumbernauld, brother-in-law of the Regent, and Thomas Boyd, younger, of Kilmarnock.[1] Later historians, thinking it unlikely that James should have thus early shown his hand, have doubted whether this step preceded his coronation and first Parliament. But Bower, who is right in the date of the Parliament, is probably also right in dating these arrests the 13th of May; and his account receives corroboration from a payment in the customs' account of Haddington extending from June 1424 to May 1425, for the expenses of the imprisonment of Walter Stewart in the Bass, with similar entries of £13, 16s. 8d. and £2, 6s. 8d. in the North Berwick account.[2]

On May 21st 1424, the King and Queen were crowned at Scone by Henry Wardlaw Bishop of St Andrews, Murdach Duke of Albany discharging the office which belonged by hereditary right to the Earl of Fife, of placing him in the throne: and the list of nobles on whom he on this occasion bestowed knighthood includes the name of Murdach's son, Alexander Stewart.[1] Between his coronation and his first Parliament, which opened on the 26th May, he must have been at Dundee, where his expenses are entered as £37, 2s. 9d.[2]

The impress of the royal legislator is to be seen in all the enactments of his first Parliament. We have laws against rebellion, private war, and various sorts of oppression, and for the improvement of agriculture. Inquiry is ordered regarding alienations of the crown lands; and the King is empowered to call for the evidents of all persons possessing lands which had belonged to the Crown at the demise of Robert I. Persons enjoying annuities from the customs must in like manner produce the charter under which they are payable. The importance of greater skill in the use of the longbow had strongly impressed itself on James; and there is an enactment making practice with that weapon general and compulsory.[3] We have an act regarding the coinage which was never carried into effect: some new customs were imposed, and a subsidy was decreed for the payment of the money due to England. James's first Exchequer audit, of which the records are lost, immediately followed the Parliament.

[1] "Extracta e variis Cronicis Scocie," p. 227.

[2] Page 383. The record of this Parliament bears that it was held at Perth; it is here said, probably per incuriam, to have been at Scone.

[3] The name of Nicholas Hude, the King's "architenens," occurs in the present volume (page 624); and the early accounts of the succeeding reigns bear that large quantities of arrows were made, both for James I. and James II. (vol. v. pages 35, 36, 180, 181, 219, 345, 607). The Scotichronicon (l. xvi. c. 15) lauds the acts passed by James regarding the bow, and laments the comparative disuse of that weapon after the King's death. Perhaps the surname of Fordun's continuator (Bower or Bowmakare) may have to do with his enthusiasm on this subject. In those days a surname of this kind, if not directly indicative of a man's calling, at least suggests the craft to which his parents belonged.

The King's executive vigour was, however, still more remarkable than his legislative ability. Towards the end of the year two more persons of mark were arrested, Duncan Earl of Lennox, father-in-law of Duke Murdach, and Sir Robert Graham, younger son of Sir Patrick Graham of Kincardine. The former was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, the latter in Dunbar.

James was now beginning to carry into effect the ideas which he had nourished in secret. To strengthen the Crown, to reduce to subjection the feudal aristocracy, whose oppressions had caused so much misrule, to elevate the small lairds and the burgesses, and to make the law respected by all, were objects of which he never lost sight. But mingled with them, as a motive of action, was a thirst for vengeance on that branch of the royal family which seemed to have aimed at supplanting him, a sentiment fostered by a member of the royal house who, ostensibly friendly to James, yet cherished more hostile purposes towards him than the Albanys had ever done, namely his uncle, Walter Earl of Athole.

James's summons to the Estates to meet at Perth for his second Parliament on 13th March 1424–25 was generally obeyed. For the first eight days the proceedings were of a description not much calculated to provoke general alarm; regulations regarding trade, the imposition of new customs, a statute against Lollards, and a warning to the Benedictine and Augustinian abbots and priors to save themselves from immediate suppression by reverting to their primitive discipline. On the ninth day the King astounded the whole country by ordering the arrest of Duke Murdach and his son Sir Alexander Stewart, Archibald Earl of Douglas, who had newly succeeded his father, the Earls of Angus and March, William Hay of Erroll the Constable, Sir Alexander Seton of Gordon, Sir Alexander Irvine of Drum, Sir John Stewart of Dundonald and Sir John Stewart of Cardney, natural brothers of the late King, and others, in all nearly thirty nobles and barons, some of whom he had knighted a few months before: and he at the same time seized the castles of Falkland and Doune, and imprisoned Albany's wife, the eldest daughter and co-heir of Lennox, in the fortress of Tantallon. This measure, while intended to let the nobles generally, and particularly such of them as had been friends of Albany, feel the power of the Crown, was mainly directed against the late Regent and his family; and almost all the rest were released after a very brief imprisonment.

Meanwhile Albany's youngest son, James Stewart, who at the time of these arrests had been beyond the King's reach in the fastnesses of the Highlands, descended on Dumbarton with a large body of men, burned that town, and put to the sword thirty-two persons, including Sir John Stewart of Dundonald, in whose keeping the castle was. Escaping the King's pursuit, he fled to Ireland along with Finlay Bishop of Argyle, who had been his father's chaplain, and other accomplices.[1] Bower tells us that five of his accomplices were found, brought to the King, and drawn by horses and hanged.[2] One of the chief of them seems to have been an Adam Ged, regarding whom we have several entries in the burgh accounts of 1426.[3] Further allusion occurs in the accounts of the bailies of Dumbarton in 1429 and 1430 to James Stewart's rebellion and the burning of Dumbarton, in connection with the escheat of burgh lands belonging to another accomplice, John Macalpyn or M^{c}Calpy, chaplain.[4]

[1] That he went in the first instance to England, and remained there till 1429, appears from a safe conduct by Henry VI. to James Stewart to pass to Ireland, dated 10th May 1429.—Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 265. That he was supposed to be dead in 1429 appears from his being called "quondam Johannes Senescalli" in the Dumbarton account (p. 493), the qualifying adverb being, it may be remarked, an after insertion above the line, but seemingly in the same handwriting with the rest of the roll.

The Parliament, which had been adjourned after the arrests of March, reassembled at Stirling on the 8th of May following. The Exchequer audit—the first audit of James I. of which any accounts have been preserved—began a day earlier, and lasted above a fortnight. On the 26th of May Murdach's eldest son was brought forth to trial before the King himself, aided by an assize of twenty-one noblemen, the first named of whom is the Earl of Athole, and who also included the Earls of Douglas and March, and others who had lately felt the King's power. Walter Stewart was found guilty and beheaded without delay. Next day Albany himself and his son Alexander, and the aged Earl of Lennox, were similarly tried and executed. No record has been preserved of their trial, or even of the crime for which they suffered, except that some of the chroniclers state generally that they were accused "de roboria."[1]

Of the Exchequer audit alluded to, which seems to have come to a close a day or so before the trial of the Albanys, the only roll which has been preserved is that of the burghs, and it shows many very marked changes from the rolls of former times.

this rebellion and escheat a person designed the "Sagart Mor" or "Sacerdos magnus" (perhaps the Dean of Lennox), and one Ewen Gley. But from the account of 1429 one would gather that the two persons named were only in non-entry. Mr W. F. Skene has directed my attention to the use of the word "Sacartmor" in 1164 as the title of the head of the Iona community (Celtic Scotland, ii. p. 414), the only other instance of which he is aware of the occurrence of the term.

The gross amount of the customs (excluding newly imposed duties) is nearly twice as large as under the Albanys. While the customs for two years as returned in June 1420 amounted to £4400, 15s. 2½d., those for one year returned in May 1425 amounted to £4400, 4s. 9½d. The payments by way of annuity, which bulked so largely on the credit side of the accounts in the reigns of Robert II. and Robert III. and during the regency, have been almost entirely swept away, with the exception of certain pensions of old standing, chiefly from the fermes to the religious houses. It is curious, however, to observe a remission of custom of his hides to the Duke of Albany.[1] Generally speaking, the place of these annuities is occupied by payments for the expenses of the royal household, sometimes directly to the King, sometimes to new officials whose successors in after days became great officers of state with well defined functions, the Comptroller and the Treasurer. James, partly perhaps in imitation of the institutions with which his English residence had familiarised him, and probably as much from a jealousy of the power which recent events had taught him might be wielded by the Chamberlain, determined to deprive that officer of a part at least of his duties, and divide them among several functionaries, all having new designations. David Broun, a churchman, was made "contrarotulator,"

[1] Page 387.

James of Schaw, Steward of the King's House, John of Livingston, Clerk of Spices, and Sir Walter Ogilvy of Lintrathen, Treasurer of the Household. In the burgh accounts of 1425, these four officers, particularly Broun and Schaw, received large payments from the customs;[1] but the Chamberlain is in each case made responsible for their receipts. The Comptroller and Treasurer were therefore at first subordinates of the Chamberlain, in whose account, if we had it, the payments to them would doubtless appear. The Chamberlain was now Sir John Forrester, who had been deputy-Chamberlain under the Earl of Buchan, succeeded to the principal office on the death of the latter at Verneuil, and was an undoubted personal favourite of James.

A few remarks may here be added regarding the position of the officers of state and of the household during the remainder of the reign of James I., as indicated by the rolls.

In the burgh accounts audited in 1426, the Chamberlain is no longer the chief receiver of revenues; and Broun and Ogilvy, who are still Comptroller (compotorum rotulator)[2] and Treasurer, are made responsible for the sums—exceeding

[1] The receipts of Broun were above £800, of Schaw nearly £1100, of Livingston £560, and of Ogilvy £160. The payments made directly to the Chamberlain amounted to about £110.

[2] The Comptroller, after he becomes an independent officer, is more generally designed "compotorum rotulator" than "contrarotulator:" and a few years later we find the two designations not used synonymously, Henry Hervy, who was a subordinate officer under the Comptroller, being called "contrarotulator," while his principal, John of Spens, is "compotorum rotulator."—Pages 443, 479.

£2000 in the one case, and £700 in the other—which are committed to them.

During the remaining years of James's reign there are large sums entered in the burgh accounts for payments and furnishings to the Comptroller, often said to be for food or other supplies, and travelling expenses or similar charges. At the audits of 1430 and 1431 we find Broun superseded by John of Spens; but in 1434 and 1435—Spens having become steward of the house of the heir apparent,[1]—Broun was restored to his office, and in the last named year he was succeeded by Alexander of Nairn. Of the Treasurer we have no trace from 1428 to 1431. We also find two churchmen, with no designation of office, namely John of Winsester, Canon of Glasgow (afterwards Bishop of Moray), and Thomas of Myreton, Dean of Glasgow, receiving to account larger sums than the Comptroller; these payments to the former continuing in the audit of March 1429–30. At the audit of April 1431 Myretoun has become Treasurer, and he has received to account in the course of the past year more than £2000, while the Comptroller's receipts are under £200. Crawfurd, on the authority of a charter said by him to be in possession of the Duke of Douglas, makes William Stewart, Dean of Moray, Treasurer in 1433.[2] In the two remaining extant burgh rolls of this reign, those of 1434 and 1435, we have no payments to the Treasurer, and Winsester is the only officer besides Broun to whom extensive payments are made; but Thomas of Cranstoun, who at the audit of 1434 is called "receiver of the King's rents south of the Forth under the Treasurer,"[1] is designed Treasurer in the Moneyer's account rendered in June 1435.[2] The payments to the Chamberlain cease altogether after 1428. Other officers who receive money or furnishings for the King are John Cameron, Keeper of the Privy Seal and King's Secretary, a man of great ability, who was afterwards Bishop of Glasgow and Chancellor,[3] and the Clerk of Spices, who in 1425 and 1426 is John of Livingston, from 1428 to 1431 Nicholas of Kirkdale, and in 1435 William of Norville.

A word regarding the only two Chamberlain's accounts of James I. which have been preserved, those of 1426 and 1435,[4] which of course differ greatly from former accounts of the same officer. The payments from the custumars, bailies, and sheriffs, which used formerly to exceed £2000, have in 1426 dwindled down to £245, 4s. 5d., and disappear in 1435. The issues of the Chamberlain ayres, formerly trifling, are in 1426 £244, and in 1435 £380, 13s. 4d.: and a new item appears, the fines for forestalling the market in the burghs, which in 1436 amount to £342, 9s. The discharge side consists chiefly of second tithes of the issues of the Chamberlain ayres, and in 1426 (but not 1435) the expenses of the audit. The balance is paid in 1426 to the King, and in 1435 to the Comptroller.

VII.

Resuming the sequence of events, the Parliament held at Perth in March 1425–6 introduced the Court known as the Session. The audit followed it in April, and was held at Edinburgh. An otherwise obscure entry in the Edinburgh account of that year "pro mensa scissoris ante duellum, de mandato regis dato servienti suo, xx s.,"[1] is explained by the relation given by Bower of an incident not very reconcilable with our ideas of the usages of the age. A tailor ("plebeius scissor") complained to the King that he had been slandered by an esquire named Henry Knokkis. Knokkis denied the charge, but accused the tailor of treason; whereupon a judicial combat was arranged to take place between them at Edinburgh Castle: the King however gave orders that the combatants should be separated.[2] The same account tells us of the presence in Scotland of Simon, herald of the King of Norway,[3] whose mission was connected with the adjustment of the debt due to that power for the surrender of the Hebrides to Alexander III.

Among the most notable events of James's reign was his Inverness Parliament. With the view of reducing to subjection the outlying parts of the realm, he summoned the great Highland chiefs, including Alexander Lord of the Isles, son of Donald of Harlaw, to a Parliament to be held at Inverness in the spring of 1427, and proceeded thither at the head of a formidable force. It would seem as if the King's vigour in dealing with the House of Albany had not sufficiently prepared the chiefs beyond the Mounth for what awaited them, for his summons was generally complied with.

When John Earl of Buchan and Ross fell at Verneuil, he was survived by a younger brother Robert,[1] to whom there was a remainder, failing his issue male, in the charter of 1415. Treating as inept that charter and the resignation of the Countess Euphemia, James had restored the earldom of Ross to the heiress of line, the widow of the late Lord of the Isles, or rather, it would seem, to her son Alexander Lord of the Isles, who, during the short period of royal favour enjoyed by him before he became involved in the disturbances of the time, was one of the assize who convicted the Albanys and Lennox.

The Highland chiefs, immediately on arriving at Inverness, were, to the number of forty, arrested and committed to separate prisons, including the Lord of the Isles and his mother,[2] Angus Duff, leader of the Mackays of Strathnavern, Kenneth More (supposed to be the chief of the Mackenzies), Angus Moray, and M'Machan or Matheson of Lochalsh. Those whose crimes were most notorious were at once tried, condemned, and executed, including Alexander M'Gorrie of Garmoran, son of a half-brother of the late Lord of the Isles, and John M'Arthur Campbell; and also, as an act of impartial justice, one James Campbell, who had a commission to arrest John Lord of Isla and Kintyre, uncle of the Lord of the Isles, but had exceeded his powers in putting him to death. The greater number, however, including the Lord of the Isles, were liberated after a short imprisonment.

[2] That lady is supposed by Gregory to have died before 1429; but the rolls contain a payment to her by the King as late as July 1435 (page 633).

Of the proceedings of this Parliament there is no extant record: but there are various allusions in the rolls to the King's journey to Inverness.[1]

That the king was accompanied by his consort is shown by a payment of £22, 1s. 8d. for nineteen gowns made for as many keepers of the Queen's horses riding with her to Inverness.[2] The burghs, or some of them, had come under an obligation to carry victuals to this northern Parliament, in default of which a specific penalty was incurred.

[1] John Turyne expended £119, 3s. 0½d. for expenses of and furnishings for the King when passing the Mounth, including tents, panniers, "rubbouris," canvas, as entered in a book kept by him (page 683). The custumars of Inverness were in May 1428 allowed £15, 15s, 6d., paid to master Henry Hervy the "contrarotulator," for the King's expenses beyond the Mounth (page 452).

[2] Page 473.

We find the burgh of Montrose fined £15,[1] Haddington £10,[2] and Aberdeen £25;[3] and in the case of Aberdeen the fine, after having been charged for three years, and referred to the king's pleasure,[4] seems to have been remitted, as it does not reappear at the audit of 1435.

James assembled the Estates frequently. The Parliament immediately succeeding that of Inverness will be noticed below in connection with matters ecclesiastical: the Parliament or Council General which met at Perth in March 1427–8 is famous for the attempt made in it to introduce the principle of representation. It was proposed that the small barons should be excused from attending the Council of the nation, on condition that they sent two or more wise men from each shire to represent them; the commissioners of the shires collectively were to choose a common Speaker of the Parliament; and both Commissioners and Speaker were to have their costs defrayed. This scheme was no doubt suggested by the example of England; and though it did not extend to a separation into two houses, its object doubtless was to raise up a power which would help the Crown to check the overgrown influence of the great nobility, the gentry, who felt attendance a burden, being in the habit of returning home after merely showing themselves. Yet it would hardly be correct to call the proposed change a constitutional one. James seems to have aimed less at what in the modern sense would be called constitutionalism than at a wise and enlightened despotism. Both this scheme and a similar attempt at a later period of Scottish history proved failures: it was not till far on in the reign of James VI. that representation of the small barons began.

An Exchequer was held at Dundee in the month following this Parliament, at which the burgh accounts tell us that the King was present.[1]

No son was born to the King and Queen till October 1430; but they had had two daughters, Margaret and Elizabeth, for whose maintenance and travelling expenses there are various items of outlay in the accounts.[2] Early in 1428, or perhaps in the end of 1427, Charles VII. sent to Scotland to solicit the hand of the elder of the two Princesses for the Dauphin, then in his fifth year. Two of

[2] These include two payments to John Wellis, the King's servant, for their expenses, in the Edinburgh account of April 1428, amounting together to £71, 11s. 6d. (pages 437, 438); and in the same account of the following year £8, 9s. 2d. for their travelling expenses from Edinburgh to Perth (page 472). From the last named account we also learn that when the King and Queen went to the Inverness Parliament of 1427, the infant Princesses were left behind, and £75, 14s. paid to Michael Ramsay on their behalf (page 473). In the Inverkeithing account of April 1429, 6s. 2d. are allowed for victuals for the Princess Elizabeth spending a night in that town, and 7s. 3d. for the keep of her horses; and there is also an item of £2 for the hire of boats in which the King, the Queen, and their daughters came to Dunfermline from Leith (page 482). A payment also occurs of £75, 4s. in the Edinburgh account of March 1429–30 to Wellis, for the expenses of the King's daughters in Edinburgh and Dunfermline (page 508).

the ambassadors employed were of quality befitting such a mission, namely, Sir John Stewart of Darnley, Constable of the army of France, who had become Lord of Evreux in the land of his adoption; and Reginald of Chartres, Archbishop of Rheims, and lately Chancellor of France: and along with them was a person named in the treaty of marriage "magistrum Alanum Aurige, cancellarium Bajocensem,"[1] but who was no other than Alain Chartier the poet, then Chancellor of the church of Bayeux.[2] In the customs' account of Linlithgow rendered in 1429 we have a payment of £6, 9s. 10d. for the expenses of the Archbishop of Rheims and lord of Darnley (Derne) spending a night at Linlithgow.[3]

Notwithstanding James's English upbringing and the depressed condition of France, then nearly overwhelmed by the conjoined power of England and Burgundy, the King entered warmly into the matrimonial project, and sent an embassy to arrange about it; and on the 17th July 1428 a treaty of marriage was concluded between the Prince and Princess, to be carried into effect when the parties should attain the proper age.[4] In consideration of this alliance, Charles, by a charter dated at Chinon in November of the same year, conveyed to James I. the county of Saintonge, with the Castle and castellany of Rochefort-sur-Charente.[1]

The uneasiness created in England by this rapprochement between France and Scotland, is supposed to have been the motive of a proposal made for an interview between James and Cardinal Beaufort. James had a safe conduct from the English King, of date 1st December 1428, to meet him at Dunbar or Newcastle;[2] and the Cardinal had a safe conduct, on 10th February 1428–9, to meet the Scots at any place on the March or within Scotland.[3] That, contrary to the opinion of Pinkerton and Tytler, the meeting did take place, and on the northern side of the border, appears from the account of the custumars of Dunbar rendered in May 1429, in which £17, 19s. 6d. are allowed them for the King's expenses at the Day of Truce and meeting with the English Cardinal; and mention is made of a further sum of £3, 10s. due them in connection with the same meeting by the Dean of Glasgow (Thomas of Myretoun).[4] There is also an entry in the contemporary Haddington account of 19s. paid for the carriage of feather beds from Haddington to Dunbar and back, on the occasion of the same Day of Truce, which is there said to have been held at Coldingham.[1] The result of the meeting seems to have been the renewal of the truce with England on 12th July 1429.[2]

In the meantime the Highlands came again to engross James's attention. The leniency shown to the Lord of the Isles in comparison with other offenders of the same sort had failed of the desired effect. As soon as that chief could collect a sufficient force, he made a descent on Inverness, and committed the town to the flames; a conflagration in respect of which we find a part of the burgh fermes remitted in the succeeding years.[3] James, with his usual promptitude, set out northwards, overtook the rebel potentate in a marsh in Lochaber, and on 23rd June 1429 inflicted on him a total defeat, facilitated by the desertion to the royal side of the Clans Chattan and Cameron. That James in the course of this pursuit had crossed the sea to some of the islands, seems to be shown by a payment of 8s. to Andrew Taillefer, clerk of Chancery, for the repair of the King's "baliste" (projectile engines of some kind) on the passage to the Isles.[4]

to suing in humbler fashion: on the eve of the Festival of St Augustin, he presented himself in a kneeling attitude, and dressed in shirt and drawers, before the King, Queen, and Court, in front of the high altar of Holyrood, and surrendered his sword to the King. His life was spared, and he was committed to the Castle of Tantallon; while his mother, who had been a participator in his misdeeds, was imprisoned in Inchcolm, but liberated after fourteen months' confinement. In succeeding years occasional payments occur "domine insularum seniori" by the King's mandate, one of them said to be part of 100 marks assigned that lady.[1] In the audit of March 1429–30, we find entries for expenditure in building or repairing Urquhart[2] and Inverness Castles,[3] and provisioning the last named fortress and Dingwall.[4]

Twin sons were born to the Queen at Holyrood on 16th October 1430, who were both knighted at their baptism: the elder, Alexander, died in infancy, and the younger was his father's successor. The rolls inform us that James Duke of Rothesay had for nurse Janet, wife of Adam of Liddale, clerk of cocket of Edinburgh:[5] and at the audit of April 1431, when the Prince was six months old, we find 48 lbs. of almonds delivered by authority of the comptroller to Michael Ramsay for his expenses at Doune Castle.[1] John of Spens, till then Comptroller, became Steward of the Prince's household; and we find in the customs' accounts of Edinburgh for 1434 and 1435 payments to him for the Prince's expenses in Edinburgh Castle, in which milk, coals, endive and rushes for his chamber, and the repair of his kitchen, are specified.[2]

Among the events of 1431 were the arrests of the Earl of Douglas and Sir John Kennedy, both nephews of the King, on some ground unknown to us, and the committal of the former to Lochleven and the latter to Stirling Castle. Douglas, Bower tells us, was, as well as the Lord of the Isles, liberated at the Parliament held at Perth in October of the same year, at the request of the Queen, nobles, and prelates, while Kennedy continued in durance.[3] In the accounts of Lennox and Monteith rendered in 1434, a payment occurs of £14, 13s. 4d. to Sir John Kennedy, by his receipt, "pro expensis suis in castro de Strivelyne."[4]

The condition, however, of the Highlands continued far from satisfactory. Fresh disturbances had been raised by Donald Balloch of Isla, cousin-german of the Lord of the Isles, who, after defeating the Earl of Mar and Alan Earl of Caithness (son of James's uncle, the Earl of Athole) at Inverlochy, made his escape to Ireland. This event took place before the Parliament of October 1431 already alluded to, when there was an attempt to raise a subsidy, or rather to divert the unpaid portion of the subsidy originally voted for the King's ransom, to the purpose of quelling the disturbances in the north; a tax which seems never to have been exacted.[1] Boece gives a graphic and circumstantial narrative of a journey made by the King in person to Dunstaffnage, in the course of which the Highland chiefs crowded to his standard to make submission, and three hundred of Donald Balloch's followers were seized and led to immediate execution, while Donald himself was betrayed by an Irish chief, and his head sent to the King.[2] Tytler thought that he had found corroborative evidence of this story in an act of this same Parliament directed against persons who had been warned to pass north with the King and failed to do so.[3] But neither in any of the contemporary chronicles nor in the Exchequer rolls is there the smallest indication of such an expedition; and it is impossible to doubt that the allusion in the act is to the muster at Inverness in 1427, in respect of absence from which, as has been observed, several of the burghs were fined. Donald Balloch was, in point of fact, alive in the closing years of the reign of James II., and taking an active share in the rebellion of the Earl of Ross.[1]

Notwithstanding the truce of 1431, the relations with England were far from cordial. The non-payment of the stipulated ransom money was one subject of dissatisfaction, and another was the projected matrimonial alliance with France, which became more objectionable since France had begun to recover her prestige among the powers of Europe. Lord Scrope was, however, sent to Scotland with proposals of a permanent peace, which would have been decidedly advantageous for Scotland, but were thwarted in Parliament by the obstinacy of the prelates. The marriage of the Princess Margaret took place in 1436, when she had attained her twelfth and the Dauphin his thirteenth year. An expedition was fitted out in England to intercept the Scottish ships and kidnap the bride: but the English ships were diverted from their purpose by the pursuit of some Flemish merchantmen; and the Princess, passing safely to Rochelle, was married at Tours by the Archbishop of Rheims on 6th July 1436. One of the latest events of James's reign was an invasion of England to avenge the contemplated affront to his daughter, ending ingloriously in the sudden abandonment of the siege of Roxburgh.

VIII.

The attitude of James I. towards the Church has hardly been understood by our ordinary historians, whose general idea seems to be that the King, finding in the clergy a useful counterpoise to the great nobles, deemed it prudent to ingratiate himself with them by passing measures in their interest and at their instigation, one of these being the act of his first Parliament against Lollards.

In reality, James was an earnest reformer, in Church as well as in State: his zeal for Church reform showed itself in his sending eight representatives, including the Bishops of Glasgow and Brechin and the Abbots of Melrose and Dundrennan, to the Council of Basle.[1]

A statute of the Parliament held at Perth in July 1427 throws a characteristic light on James's relations with the Church, and requires a word of explanation, were it only from the allusions in the rolls to the proceedings to which it gave rise.

The churchmen of Scotland had in time past been far from subservient to Rome. In the Provincial Councils, which the Scottish Church had for two hundred years before James's time been empowered to hold, two Doctors of Civil Law, who attended on the part of the King, were understood to have a right to protest and appeal against any proceedings prejudicial to him; and the decisions of the prelates in synod were from time to time overruled by Parliament. In 1391 a disputed election to the office of Prior of the Benedictine monastery of Urquhart was finally decided, on appeal from the Bishop of Moray, by the King in Parliament with the advice of the clergy present :[1] and it was not the Provincial Council but the Parliament that entertained and decided the question whether Pope Martin v. should be acknowledged after the deposition of the anti-pope by the Council of Constance. Elsewhere than in Scotland the clergy would have considered that the secular authority was stepping out of its province when the King and Parliament ordered the Bishops to make inquest for Lollards and heretics. But it was decidedly a novelty even in Scotland when the State proceeded to regulate the expenses of litigants and alter the established forms of procedure by lay suitors against the clergy in the spiritual courts. The Act of 1427, by which this was done, is indeed unique, both in the boldness with which it deals with matters ecclesiastical, and in the injunction at its close that its provisions should be forthwith confirmed by the Provincial Council which was then sitting.[2]

This statute, which the King had framed with the assistance of his newly appointed Chancellor, John Cameron, Bishop of Glasgow, excited alarm at Rome, whither the Chancellor and other prelates of the King's Council were summoned by Martin v. for having made and published ordinances derogatory to the rights of the Church and the Holy See. James, resenting the Pope's interference, sent John Crannach, Bishop of Brechin, and Alexander of Lauder, Archdeacon (afterwards Bishop) of Dunkeld, to the Roman Court to remonstrate, and to plead that the Chancellor's duties precluded his leaving home.[1] The embassy was one of great moment, and there are large payments towards it in the rolls, mostly from the source from which, as will be seen, the King was wont to draw on every exigency, the subsidy raised for his ransom. £250 Flemish were in the year 1429 paid by John Turyne to the ambassadors, then at Bruges on their way to Rome; and another £100 to a banker at Bruges to reimburse them for outlay on what are called the affairs of the Bishop of Glasgow:[2] and Lauder receives in addition twenty nobles from the commissars of Linlithgow.[3] But the mission was unsuccessful. In 1433 a nuncio arrived with a citation for the Chancellor to the Papal Court, and escaping immediately, was pursued by letters summoning him to answer in Parliament for rebellion and treason, and deprived of an archdeaconry which he held in Scotland. A new ambassador was despatched from Scotland, Columba of Dunbar, Bishop of Moray, who in December of the same year had a safe conduct to pass through England on his way to the Papal Court:[1] in Turyne's account there occurs a payment to him going to Rome in connection with the same affairs.[2] Other entries exist of payments at Bruges connected with embassies to Rome.[3] It may be added generally, that the breach becoming wider, James at last found it necessary to temporise; and the rupture with Rome was only in process of being healed at his death.

James's admonition to the Benedictine and Augustinian monks to amend their ways has been already adverted to, and various minor evidences are to be found in this volume of the supervision exercised by the Scottish King over the religious orders. The chapel of St Laurence was one of the numerous religious houses in Perth which had enjoyed a small annuity from the days of Robert Bruce. It was given by Robert III. to the Dominican monastery of the same town, that prayers might be offered there for the soul of his mother Elizabeth Mure. In 1422 we for the first time find receipts for this pension granted by the Prior of the Dominicans:[4] and in 1429 and two succeeding years the auditors are directed to prohibit any further payment of the annuity, until the chapel, which had been allowed to become a ruin, should be rebuilt,[1] which, it must be presumed, was done before 1434.[2]

But James's most promiment act as a benefactor of the Church was the founding and endowing of the great Carthusian convent of Perth, the only establishment of that order which ever existed in Scotland, generally known as the "Vallis Virtutis" or "Vallis Virtutum," though at first called in the rolls "Clara Vallis."[3] The original letter sent to the King by the Prior of the Grande Chartreuse, of date 19th August 1426—now in possession of the Hospital of Perth—authorised the erection of a house of the Order at Perth, for the accommodation of thirteen monks and a competent number of servants, who were to serve God perpetually for the souls of the King and Queen, and the heirs, predecessors, and successors of the King. The King engaged to endow the house with 200 marks, to guarantee to it the privileges and liberties of the Order, and to cause it to be built in accordance with the requirements of the Order, as explained by the Prior of the Mount of Grace of Ingilby in Yorkshire, and by Dean Brice (Wycht) of the same house. Friar Oswald de Corda, vicar of the Grande Chartreuse of Grenoble, was the first Prior, a man, according to Bower, famed for his learning and his saintly life. Of the many payments which appear in the accounts towards the building of this monastery, not a few are made from the tax raised for the King's ransom, namely, 100 nobles paid to Dean Brice in 1429, 289 nobles to Friar John of Bute, a Cistercian who seems to have had some charge of the building,[1] 93 nobles to the above named Friar Oswald,[2] and £40, 1s. 8d. Flemish paid by John Turyne at Bruges through the Prior of the Carthusian Convent there.[3] Towards the same object £122 and £16 are paid in 1434 and 1435 from the customs of Perth;[4] while the custumars of Edinburgh are credited to the extent of £9, 3s. for iron,[5] and £4, 10s. for glass[6] for the works. The Prior also gets from the King Muscadel wine to the value of £13, and Rhine wine to the value of £8.[7]

Two ancient nunneries at Perth were suppressed by the King, and this convent endowed with their lands and revenues. One of them was the hospital of St Leonard, where Lady Elizabeth Dunbar, the rejected fiancée of the Duke of Rothesay, had been Prioress; the other was the hospital of St Mary Magdalene, lying in the southern outskirts of Perth. In the accounts of the bailies of Perth we find an annuity of £8 from the fermes of that town, which had from the days of Robert Bruce been paid to the former hospital, after being received for four years by the before mentioned Friar John of Bute,[8] probably for the new religious house, permanently devoted to its use in 1434:[1] and from 1435 we find the same diversion of the smaller annuity received by the hospital of St Mary Magdalene.[2] The Carthusians of Perth seem always to have maintained a good reputation and adhered to the rules of their Order. Their convent was entirely destroyed at the Reformation, and the hospital of James VI. built nearly on its site.

IX.

While James's strong-handed efforts to bring all classes of his subjects under the dominion of the laws deserve the fullest acknowledgment, it is undeniable that his policy of enriching the Crown at the expense of the greater nobles often led him to overstep the limits of that even-handed justice which he would have others respect.

By the execution and attainder of Albany and his family, the valuable earldoms of Fife and Menteith became the property of the Crown. If there are considerations that can be urged in extenuation of the King's severity towards the house of Albany, the case of the Earl of Lennox stood on a different footing. It is difficult to imagine what the crime was for which he suffered; and, though no sentence of attainder was pronounced against him, we find the king quietly taking

Nor is it possible to vindicate the means by which James secured to himself the important earldoms of Strathern, March, and Mar.

The earldom of Strathern, when it fell to the Crown in 1346, was bestowed by David II. on his nephew the Steward, afterwards Robert II.; and Robert, almost immediately on his accession, granted it to David Stewart, the eldest son of his second marriage. The original grant is not extant, but various confirmations of it are on record, in all of which the limitation is distinctly to "heirs," that is heirs of line.[2] His daughter and heir married Sir Patrick Graham, who in her right became Earl of Strathern; and their son Malise, a minor, was Earl Palatine of Strathern when James

[1] In the only extant roll of Ballivi ad extra during this reign, rendered only a year before James's murder, the rents of Lennox are accounted for, and among other entries is a payment for the Comptroller's expenses at Dumbarton during the previous year letting the lands of the earldom (page 593). The same account contains a payment of £7, 6s. 8d. to the widow of the beheaded Earl, "Elene comitisse quondam de Levenax," a lady whose paternity genealogists have been unable to discover, and of £29, 6s. 8d. to her daughter, Isabel Duchess of Albany, junior, not of course styled Countess of Lennox (page 591). The widow of Duke Murdach was doubtless a prisoner at Tantallon in 1429, when another payment was made of £8, 2s. for her dress and adornment (page 473). It was only in the succeeding reign that she was allowed to occupy her island castle of Inchmurrin and exercise her feudal rights as Countess of Lennox. The widow of Robert Duke of Albany had a pension of £66, 13s. 4d. settled on her by James I., which was regularly paid her from 1428 till her death in 1449.

[2] Reg. Mag. Sig. pp. 85, 86, 87, 93 98, 122. A curious account of the rents of this earldom when in the hands of David Stewart is printed in vol. iii. page 33.

returned from captivity. On the palpably groundless pretext that the earldom was a male fee, James in 1427 took it from Malise, and conferred it, though only in liferent, on Walter Earl of Athole, his own uncle and Malise's grand-uncle. As a trifling compensation Malise got, nominally at least, the very inferior earldom of Menteith, though it appears from the rolls that the lands of the last named earldom really continued in the King's hands.[1] A few months after this transaction the deprived Earl of Strathern had to proceed to England as a supplementary hostage for the King, where he remained in the same capacity for twenty-four years.[2]

George Earl of March was son of the Earl of March who, after renouncing his allegiance and being forfeited in the time of Robert III., had been restored by Albany in 1409 with some sacrifice of territory. The son's loyalty had never been questioned: he had been active in promoting his Sovereign's return from England, was one of the assize who convicted Albany, and had been serviceable to James in other ways. But in 1434 his Castle of Dunbar was suddenly seized, and he was

[1] In 1431 Patrick Don is mentioned as chamberlain of Menteith under the King (page 530). In the roll of Ballivi ad extra of 1434 the rents of the earldom of Menteith are accounted for along with those of the earldom of Lennox; and a portion of the former earldom, consisting of Erlelevin, Drumfyn and Duntreyve (Duntreath), is stated to have been bestowed by the King on William of Edmonstone, husband of his sister the Countess of Angus (page 589).

himself arrested and imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, on the pretext that Albany had exceeded the powers of a Regent in restoring his father.

In the case of the earldom of Mar, the "iniquitie of the tyme" which Queen Mary in the following century set herself to redress, did not originate with James I. Robert III., in breach of an engagement to sanction no act which might prejudice the right of the heir-presumptive, confirmed Alexander Stewart in a liferent of the earldom bestowed on him by his wife the Countess Isabel. We have already seen Earl Alexander bargaining with the Regent Murdach to have that liferent right converted into a fee with a contingent reversion to Murdach, and with the further stipulation that the consent of the then captive King was to be obtained to this act of injustice; and in May 1426 a charter was granted by James I. to this liferent Earl and his natural son, in exactly the terms suggested to the late Regent, excepting only the substitution for the proposed reversion to Albany of a reversion to the King himself—a condition which in 1435 brought the earldom to the Crown, to the prejudice of Robert Lord Erskine, the rightful heir.[1]

[1] But for a late attempt to throw doubt on the fact that the Erskines were the descendants and representatives of Sir John of Menteith, the husband of Ellen of Mar, it would hardly be necessary to advert to an incidental corroboration of their pedigree which these rolls afford. Arran belonged in the fourteenth century to the Menteiths. In 1357 John of Menteith, son of Sir John, as lord of Arran, granted to the monks of Kilwinning the patronage of the church of Kilwinning (Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 34). From 1387 onwards, in or before which year John

Among the enemies whom these forfeitures had raised up was Sir Robert Graham, uncle of the deprived Earl of Strathern, a man of headstrong and impetuous character, who in the Parliament of 1435 had expressed himself of the King in such language as caused him to be arrested and banished. He retired from the court brooding revenge; and was the most prominent actor in the dismal conspiracy by which James's life was brought to an end. But Bower, the author of the "Liber Pluscardensis," and Monstrelet, all contemporary authorities, as well as Drummond of Hawthornden, Bishop Leslie, Buchanan, and Hume of Godscroft, are agreed that the real originator of the plot was not so much Graham as Walter Earl of Athole, the King's uncle. A vague doubt, which it would have been treasonable to express, hung over the legitimacy of the first family of Robert II.;[1] and the children of Euphemia Ross secretly cherished the idea that they had been unjustly excluded from the throne. The Earl of Athole was in the male line the of Menteith must have died, we find an annuity of £100 allowed from the burgh fermes and fishings of Aberdeen to Sir Thomas of Erskine in right of his wife (vol. iii. pages 217, 233, 261, etc.). It was paid to Erskine till his death; and after his death, which occurred in 1405, it was received by his widow and expressly said to be due to her in her own right (vol. iii. page 639). After her death it continued to be paid to Sir Robert of Erskine as her son and heir (vol. iv. pages 259, 331, 397, etc.); and in 1428 and following years until the end of the reign of James, the entries regarding this annuity bear that it had been granted by charter of Robert II. "per excambium terrarum de Arane" (pages 437, 490, 520, 550, 586). It continued to be paid to the Erskines down to 1532, when it was purchased from John Lord Erskine by Bishop Gavin Dunbar for behoof of the hospital founded by him at Old Aberdeen.

representative of that branch.[1] Crafty and prudent, he had long waited his time. He was supposed to have had a hand in the proceedings for restraining the Duke of Rothesay which ended so fatally. He had artfully ingratiated himself with James, and, according to contemporary belief, was the chief adviser of his attempt to extirpate the house of Albany. Any members of that house who survived were exiles or in obscurity ;[2] and besides them, only the King and his infant son stood between him and the throne. With all his discernment of character, the King was unsuspicious of his uncle, and accumulated wealth and honours on him. He was first made Great Justiciary of Scotland, then Earl Palatine of Strathern for life. The post of private Chamberlain to the King was given to his grandson and heir ; and the rolls from year to year contain remissions of custom and gifts to him.[3] But he had all along been maturing his designs on the throne, with his grandson as his accomplice, and Graham as his tool. On the 20th February 1436–7, the Court were occupying the Dominican convent at Perth, often the residence of royalty after the [1] His right would certainly have been considered preferable to that of the issue female of his elder brother David Earl of Strathern. In the settlements of the Crown from the time of Robert Bruce there had been a strong leaning to male succession. The then existing settlement called the whole male issue of each of the sons of Robert II. in succession before heirs female could come in.

Castle had got into disrepair; and when the King was about to retire for the night, the sound of men in armour was heard outside the gates. The King's chamber was invaded by Graham and a body of three hundred Highlanders; and James, who had taken refuge in a vault under the floor, was discovered, dragged out, and brutally murdered, the assassins making their escape to the fastnesses of the Highlands. Thus tragically perished, in the 44th year of his age, and the 31st of his nominal and 13th of his real reign, the greatest and ablest of all the Stewart Kings of Scotland.

The Scottish coinage and the value of money during the period of this volume call for a few remarks.

The silver money coined immediately after the return of David II. from his captivity was nearly equal in value to that of England: but from that date onwards to the close of the reign of Robert III. there was a gradual deterioration and debasement of the currency. While English proclamations of 1373 and 1374 dealt with four pence Scots as the equivalent of three pence English, in 1390 and 1398 Scots money was ordered to be received for only half its nominal value.[1] A Scots act of 1393 ordered the coinage of groats, half-groats, pennies and half-pennies, equal in weight and fineness to the money of David, and of the gold piece called a lion (otherwise known as a St Andrew) worth 5s.: and the same statute fixed the value of an English noble at 9s. 6d. and a Flemish noble at 9s. 4d.[1]

No Mint accounts exist of the eighteen years' regency, and no mention seems to exist anywhere of the names of any officer of the Mint of that period. As Albany had his Great Seal and issued Crown charters in his own name, analogy would lead us to expect that any coins struck by him would bear his name as Governor. No coins however with his name are known to exist. A payment of 36s. 3d. by the moneyer of Edinburgh in the Chamberlain's account of 1412[2] seems to indicate the coining of money to some extent; and some of the fleur-de-lis groats bearing the name of James have been attributed to this period, though there seems no positive evidence that they were struck before 1424.

Notwithstanding a provision in his first Parliament for the striking of money of the same weight and fineness as that of England, James further debased the coinage. We get no direct light on this subject from the only Mint accounts of this reign which have been preserved, namely, two accounts of Robert Gray the moneyer, of dates June 1434 and June 1435.[3] These accounts speak of coinages both of silver and of gold, and the latter specifies the silver pieces as groats and small money. In the account of 1434 the seignorage on the gold money is computed at £1, 9s. 4d. per lb. of 16 ounces, in that of 1435 at 16s. The seignorage on silver money, which had been 7d. and 8d. in the reign of David II., is calculated at the rate of 8s. in the account of 1434; in that of 1435 at 9s. 3d. on groats and 5s. on smaller pieces. The warden (gardianus monete), the same officer who is in the earlier accounts called "custos monete," has for his fee 1d. on each twelve ounces of gold and silver, and the "sculptor ferrorum" the same.

[1] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, i. p. 569.

[2] Page 159.

[3] Pages 577, 625.

In the Parliament of October 1436 provision was made for a supply of gold and silver for the Mint by two Acts, one obliging all exporters of merchandise to import a specified amount of bullion, and the other altogether prohibiting the export of gold and silver, whether coined or uncoined, and jewels.[1]

It is not improbable that part at least of the silver coined in this reign was native. James's first Parliament declared that mines of gold and silver producing three half-pennies of silver out of the pound of lead should belong to the King;[2] and there seems to have been in the King's employment a miner (also designed "finour") from Frome in Cornwall.[3]

We learn more about the monetary state of the country from the customs' accounts. In the Dundee accounts, rendered in April 1431, the great custumars are allowed £4, 14s. 4d. and the custumars of woollen cloth 10s. 7d. for sums received by them before the change of money and paid to the King after it.[1] The accounts of 1432 and 1433 are wanting. In those of 1434 and 1435 the custom is paid in old money, which is computed to be worth one-fifth more than new. The payments from the customs, on the other hand, are made in the new currency, though in a few instances an allowance is made to annuitants in consideration of the change.[2]

The accounts of the King's subsidy rendered by the commissars of the burghs, and the account of John Turyne, contain a good deal of information about the comparative value of Scotch, English, and Flemish money. In 1428 we find Scots money reckoned at exactly half of Flemish.[3] In 1426 the English noble is quoted as current for 15s. Scots,[4] in 1430 for 16s.;[5] and at different dates unnamed it is said to have varied in value from account of £20 and £15, "Gerardo de Frangia le mynour" (pages 436, 437); while in the Aberdeen account we find £3, 4s. of iron bought and delivered "Gerardo Fraunce de From, le finour" (page 443), probably the same person; and in the following year there occurs a small payment to a servant of the miner (minatoris) bringing a boat to northern parts (page 470).

13s. 4d.[1] to 18s.[2] The English noble in Flanders was worth 8s. Flemish from March 1427 to spring of 1429,[3] 8s. 4d. from May 1429 to February 1429–30,[4] 8s. 8d. in 1430 and 1431,[5] 9s. in November 1431,[6] and 9s. 6d. in 1431 and 1432.[7]

During the period of this volume the great customs continued to be levied at the same nominal rates to which they had been raised for the purpose of affording a fund to pay the ransom of David II., namely, two marks for the sack of wool, one mark for the hundred woolfells, and four marks for the last of hides. The gradual deterioration of the coinage of course made these rates less burdensome than they were at first; though in the last two burgh rolls of James I., as already remarked, the King, on a still further depreciation, required that the custom should be paid in old money and not new. The highest annual yield of the customs on wool and hides in James's reign was in 1428, when they amounted to £6912, 2s. 5½d.: the average yield did not much exceed £5000.

But various new imposts were established by James. In his first Parliament he imposed a duty on the exportation of skins of the martin, polecat, otter, fox, hart, hind, roe, and doe. The rates were 6d. on each "mertrik" skin, 8d. on each ten "fulmartis skynnis callyt fethokys," 1s. on each hundred "cunyng skynnis," 6d. on each ten otter skins or tod skins, 1s. on each ten hart and hind skins, and 4d. on each ten "dais and rais skynnis."[1] This duty brought but a small return to the Crown, and probably operated as a check on the trade which had sprung up in these commodities. The most that we find this new custom bringing in any year was £3, 16s. 8d. in 1431; and the average yield was not much above £1. The skin principally exported was that of the rabbit; but at Inverness skins of the fox, otter, martin, and polecat appear in the accounts.[2] Deer skins only occur in the customs account of Elgin.[3]

Another Act of the same Parliament imposed a custom of 1s. in the pound on the exportation of horses, sheep, and cattle, and a small duty on herrings, in respect of which only a single entry occurs, in an Ayr account.[4]

Two much more important customs were imposed by an Act of the next Parliament,—an ad valorem duty on woollen cloth of 2s. in the pound, and a duty of 2s. 6d. in the pound on salmon "bocht be strangers and had out of the realme." By the same statute goods imported from England were subjected to a duty of 2s. 6d. in the pound.[1]

While the finer woollen and linen fabrics in use in Scotland were imported, there was a coarse quality of woollen cloth made in the country, which was in considerable demand in foreign markets; and the duty now enforced on it added considerably to the revenue. The cloth exported is generally described in the customs' accounts as white, but on some occasions grey.[2] About £3000 worth of cloth must have been exported yearly, as the annual yield of the tax during this reign averaged nearly £300. The rate sometimes appears in the ordinary customs' account; but in the more considerable burghs of export, it was oftener returned by a separate officer known as the custumar of woollen cloth.

The custom of salmon, like that of woollen cloth, is sometimes rendered separately, and sometimes appears in the ordinary account of the custumars. It was provided in 1426[3] that the custom of "salmon and fische" should be exacted from native exporters as well as strangers.[4] In place of the ad valorem duty prescribed, we generally find the custom charged by "Hamburg barrel" and "herring barrel" otherwise called "small barrel," the former being charged 5s., as presumably containing £2 value, and the latter 2s. 6d., as containing the value of £1. The smaller barrel seems to have contained grilse, which were regarded as salmon; at least barrels of grilse occur in the accounts of Aberdeen and Montrose,[1] on which the same custom is charged as on herring barrels of salmon.[2] The ports from which salmon were exported are principally Aberdeen, Banff, and Montrose; and the average yearly yield of the duty was about £115, corresponding to £920 worth of fish. In an Ayr account there is a rather puzzling charge of 5s. on the exportation of 25 dozen "mullones," a fish which it is difficult to identify, and a rate which corresponds neither to that imposed for salmon nor for herring.[3]

From 1428 onwards there appears in the accounts a custom on white salt at the rate of 5d. on the twelve chalders,[4] a duty which must have been imposed under some statute not now extant, and added little to the revenue.

In the burgh rolls of 1429–30 and 1431, there is an account of Sir Thomas of Kirkpatrick and Michael Ramsay as custumars of goods and chattels (or cattle?) led into England (bonorum et catallorum ductorum in Anglia); and in 1431 also as custumars of goods of England sold within the realm.[1] It would seem that Kirkpatrick and Ramsay were entrusted with the office of preventing horses, sheep, and cattle from finding their way across the border to English purchasers without the duty of 1s. in the pound imposed in James's first Parliament having been paid; and that they further had to enforce, as far as they could, the duty introduced in 1425 of 2s. 6d. in the pound on the importation of English goods. That their function was to check the importing or exporting of commodities chargeable with custom by land, and not by sea, seems clear, as there is in 1431 a further account of David of Hume, custumar for the East March "bonorum et catallorum ductorum in Anglia," and of English goods sold within the realm.[2] There is a similar account of Michael Ramsay in 1434;[3] but in each case the amount realised is trifling.

[2] In the Aberdeen account of 1431, "barillia allecum de grilse," are specified (page 536). That the Hamburg barrel did not always cost exactly 40s. or the small barrel 20s. is apparent from many entries regarding the purchase of salmon. Small barrels and herring barrels are not always identical terms: in the Aberdeen account of 1429, the price of the Hamburg barrel is 45s., of the small barrel 25s., and of the herring barrel 20s. (page 479).

The customs' accounts rendered in June 1435 show that by some no longer extant act customs had been imposed on four different descriptions of dressed skins of sheep or lambs which had hitherto been exported duty free, namely, schorlings, skaldings, futefells, and lenternware. The hundred schorlings paid 6s. 8d., the hundred skaldings or futefells 3s. 4d., and the hundred lenternware 1s. Schorling is doubtless the skin of a shorn sheep; and lenternware and lambskin seem to be used as convertible words.[1] What skaldings were is not very clear. Futefells are supposed by Jameson to be "the skins of lambs that have died soon after they were dropped;" but if so, it is remarkable that they paid a higher duty than the ordinary lambskin. The customs on these classes of skins brought in £377, 7s. 9d. at the audit of 1435.

XII.

The history of the subsidy imposed in James's first Parliament for his ransom is curious and interesting. The amount originally agreed to be paid was 60,000 marks English, in six yearly instalments of 10,000 marks: but the sixth payment was to be passed from by way of dowry to the Queen.[2] Thus 50,000 marks only were to be paid, namely, 10,000 marks a year for five years.

To enable these payments to be made, a subsidy of one shilling in the pound for two successive years was imposed by the Parliament of 1424.[3] We have an indication of the supposed comparative wealth of the different estates in the arrangement made that the burgesses were to contribute two fifths of the whole debt, or 20,000 marks, that is 10,000 marks (=20,000 nobles) for each of the two years of the tax.[4] Officers called commissars from

[1] Pages 612, 613.

[2] Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 246.

[3] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 4.

[4] The share borne by them was exactly double that apportioned to the same estate in 1366, when of a tax of 2000 marks the barons contributed 1000, the clergy 600 and the burgesses 400 marks (Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, i. p. 498).

each burgh, appointed in terms of the act, took in hand to make the first payment of 10,000 marks, on condition that strangers should trade exclusively with them: and to enable them to advance the money, they were to proceed to Flanders to borrow on the security of the Scottish merchants, 300 nobles being paid them for their expenses.

We have the accounts of these commissars in roll CLXXIII., purporting to have been audited in July 1435,[1] and appended to them is an account of William Foulis, keeper of the Privy Seal, who seems to have been sent to Flanders to receive money from the commissars and spend it for the King. The accounts are rendered in English nobles, a noble being one half of a mark, or 6s. 8d. The charge side of the account of each commissar contains a payment corresponding to each of the two years of the subsidy by the principal auditor and receiver of the tax, William Stephen, Bishop of Dunblane. The total of these payments comes within a fraction of the 40,000 nobles which it was stipulated that the burgesses should contribute. Bower, himself an auditor of the tax, tells us that while in the first year 14,000 marks were received and paid to the King, the second year's receipts were incomparably less.[1] But the discharge sides show that, as in the case of other taxes raised for specified purposes both in England and Scotland, the money received was to a large extent diverted to entirely different objects. Of the 40,000 nobles collected from the burghs, a little above 16,800 nobles or 8400 marks found its way to England; the remainder was paid away to the King, to his Treasurer and Comptroller, to Foulis, to the moneyer, and to two persons engaged in making large purchases for James in the Low Countries, namely, a foreigner in the King's employment designated John Ducheman (Dutchman), and John Turyne, provost and a custumar of Edinburgh.[2]

[1] These accounts, however, bear internal evidence of having been extended in their present form at least a year and half later, or after the death of James I. On page 652 reference is made to an account of the master of works at Linlithgow rendered in the year 1436. On page 666, James's great ship is spoken of as "magna navis progenitoris domini regis."

We have no account of the contribution from either barons or clergy; but, taking Bower's statement along with the terms of the Act of 1429, about to be alluded to, it is clear that the barons at [1] Scotichronicon, l. xvi. c. 9.

[2] Turyne's separate account of his receipts from the tax, mounting up to £6546, 10s. 10d. in Scots money, will be noticed below. The balance of Foulis' account, amounting to £44, 6s. 6d. Scots, is set off against a larger sum lent him by the King to recover the lands of Merchamstoun, pledged to Alexander Naper.

The pledging of Merchamstoun is again mentioned in a roll of 1438. The Crown failed to redeem that estate from Naper, who acquired it in property, and became ancestor of the famous inventor of logarithms, and of a distinguished line of naval and military heroes.

A few payments occur in the burgh accounts of 1426, to John Cameron, keeper of the Privy Seal, in respect of the tax; namely, £104, 1s. 8d. from the custumars of Edinburgh (page 410); £66, 13s. 4d. from the custumars of Linlithgow (page 414); £1, 3s. 4d. from the bailies of Perth (page 422); £2, 8s. 8d. from the bailies of Aberdeen (page 423); and 5s. from the bailies of Crail (page 424); and there is also in 1428 a payment of 3s. 4d. by the bailies of Crail "pro contribucione financie" (page 460): but it may be doubted whether any of these sums ever found their way to England.

least were slower than the burgesses in responding to the call made on them.

The money due to the King of England was to a large extent assigned by the King and Council to Richard Buckland, treasurer of Calais, to meet the expense of works then going on there, and in part also to the Earl of Northumberland, in repayment of expenses connected with the town of Berwick and the East Marches; and the payments made by the commissars for the proper object of the tax are for the most part said to be made to Buckland, either in Zealand or at Bruges, and in part also to the Earl of Northumberland. The entries regarding the payments in question, as given in the printed "Rotuli Scotiæ," are somewhat ambiguous and misleading, sometimes including and sometimes excluding receipts cancelled in consequence of the non-payment of the sums contained in them. To Mr Hardy's kindness the editor is indebted for a careful note of the receipts in the exact form in which they appear in the original record, which with the valuable accompanying observations of the Deputy Keeper of the Records, is printed in the Appendix to this Preface.[1] A comparison of those receipts with the accounts of the commissars shows that of the whole yield from the three Estates, no more than 9000 marks—namely, 7000 paid to Buckland and 2000 to Northumberland—found their way to England; and that the whole of that sum except 600 marks was paid by the burgesses. The first year's instalment was therefore never completely paid; and no part of the remaining instalments were paid at all.

As therefore more than four-fifths of the stipulated 50,000 marks remained due, the majority of the Scottish hostages were permanently detained in England. Many of them, according to Bower, died in England; others, when he wrote, were still there and never likely to return;[1] and the writer of the "Liber Pluscardensis," of date c. 1461, adds that some ransomed themselves, some escaped, and some remained thirty-four years there, "quorum expensæ et dampna regnum Scociæ de centum millibus librarum pejoraverunt."[2] Allusions to James's hostages continue to a late date in the "Rotuli Scotiæ." In February 1445–6, Alan of Cathcart, a hostage for the late King of Scots, gets leave to substitute his son in his place.[3] On 17th June 1453, the deprived Earl of Strathern, who had gone to England as a hostage on 9th December 1427, was liberated from Pontefract Castle, his son and heir Alexander surrendering himself in his stead, and the then Earl of Douglas and Lord Hamilton becoming sureties for his return in case of the escape of Alexander.[4]

On one or two other occasions James attempted to raise a subsidy. One was in 1431, when a contribution was ordered for the "resisting of the King's rebellouris in the north lande:"[1] but the statute of that year was rather an enforcement of the former subsidy of twelve pence in the pound on those who had failed to pay it, and a diversion of it from its original purpose, than a new tax. On lands which had paid only two pence of the former tax the remaining ten pence were to be raised, and the whole twelve pence in the pound were to be exacted where nothing had formerly been paid. There is a rather obscure allusion in the account of the commissar of Dunfermline to a tax of two pence in the pound for the English embassy.[2] According to Bower, although no tax was imposed, an aid was requested for the expenses of the marriage of the Dauphiness and her transport to France, and voluntary contributions were made to a considerable extent by all the three Estates.[3]

Among the works undertaken by James I. which the rolls bring prominently before us is the rebuilding of the royal residence at Linlithgow. The foundation charter of Holyrood indicates that a castle existed at Linlithgow in the twelfth century: and in 1263 the manor of Linlithgow was assigned by Alexander III. in name of dowry to the daughter of the Count of Flanders, on her marriage with his son.[1] Edward I. built a tower or pele[2] there in 1302, the accounts for the erection of which are extant. The Exchequer rolls show that the first two Stewart Kings frequently resided at Linlithgow;[3] and small items of expenditure on the manor there occur towards the end of the reign of Robert III. and once during Albany's regency.[4] During the whole period of the regency one Angus de Camera got ten marks yearly for its custody.[5]

[1] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 20.

Soon after James's return from England the town, palace, and nave of the church of Linlithgow were consumed by fire;[6] and the King at once set himself to rebuild the palace in a style and form new in Scotland, and suggestive rather of a settled country than of a state of things in which defence was the first consideration. In the accounts of 1425 are payments for obtaining stone for the King's manor.[7] John Waltoun, one of the chief merchants and burgesses in Linlithgow, is made master of the works; and in the following year

[2] The name "Peel" has, in popular language, been transferred to the meadow ground surrounding Linlithgow Palace; and it would appear that the usage of so calling it is as old as the reign of James II.; for there occurs in an Exchequer account of 1453, the item of expenditure, "pro clausura warde et custodia herbarum et prati de le Pele de Lithqw, xiiij s. viij d. £76, 6s. 6d. is paid for getting stones and lime, and making a park and fish ponds, with other miscellaneous outlay.[1] Waltoun's expenditure at the audit of 1428 amounts to £600, 8s. 1½d.,[2] where also occurs a payment of £19, 17s. 8d. for the purchase of thirty roods of adjacent land on the east side of the manor,[3]; and £6 worth of tiles are sent from Dundee.[4] The interest taken in the work by James and his consort is evinced by the mention in the Linlithgow account of their frequent visits, with charges for their expenses and the keep of their horses.[5] On Palm Sunday 1428 the King and Queen are recorded to have deposited an altar offering of 15s. in the church of Linlithgow; and there is a payment by the Queen of 10s. of drink money to the masons.[6]

By this time the new buildings were so far advanced as to be habitable. The customs' account of Linlithgow rendered in April 1429 shows the King to have spent four days in June and two in July 1428 at Linlithgow, and to have been there on the 17th December following, as well as at various other dates unnamed; also that the Archbishop of Rheims and Sir John Stewart of Darnley, on their arrival from France with a proposal of marriage from the Dauphin, were entertained there for a night at the cost of £6, 9s. 10d.[7] The Queen's offering in the beginning of April 1429 (a few days after Easter, which fell on March 27th), was 20s., and the King's 5s. Waltoun, besides his account as custumar, renders one as master of the works, and states his expenditure during the first year to have been £753, 13s. 2d., referring on this as on other occasions for its details and their verification to a book kept by him.[1]

At the next audit, which took place in March 1429–30, Waltoun's expenditure on the works was £632, 19s. 7½d.;[2] and £11 are recorded as having been paid for 111 ells of broad cloth (panni lati) at various prices, for napery, of which six ells were beyond the supply required, and the rest was made into twenty-four sheets (mappe) and towels; and it was enjoined that the towels should remain permanently at Linlithgow.[3] The King and Queen, besides paying seven visits to Linlithgow at dates unspecified, are related to have spent ten days there in January 1429–30, on which occasion £88, 6s. 10d. were paid for their expenses, and also to have been there on the last day of the previous March.[4]

At the audit of 1431, the payments to masons, carpenters, and sculptors, and for wood, stone, and iron, with carriages, amounted together to £647, 5s. 7d.[5]

At the next extant audit, that of 1434, the accounts of the buildings at Linlithgow are rendered by Robert Wedale, soon afterwards Abbot of Culross, as master of works, and by Robert of Livingston; and the sums expended by them and Waltoun together amount to £1278, 13s. 10½d.[1] Some further outlay seems to be indicated for tapestry and on the park at Linlithgow, but the passage is defective;[2] and iron was supplied, for Linlithgow and Leith together, to the value of £42,[3] from Kirkcudbright, a port which at that period had a considerable traffic in iron with Spain.[4]

The heaviest expense was during the years already alluded to. Another account of Waltoun as master of works occurs in 1434, when the items included colours furnished to Matthew, the King's painter.[5] In 1435 boards were sent from Perth;[6] and in 1436 we find the commissar of Linlithgow paying, out of the subsidy raised for the King of England, 153 nobles to Wedale and Livingston as masters of the works.[7] Allusion occurs in 1434 and 1435 to rent paid by the King for the burghal lands of one John Ker,[8] a merchant in Linlithgow and collector of custom of cloth for that burgh. Later Kings went on with the works at Linlithgow which James I. began.

The rolls also contain frequent notices of repairs of and additions to the Castles of Stirling and Edinburgh. The elder Albany, when Regent, had been keeper of Stirling Castle, and in addition to other outlay spent £22, 3s. 8d. in constructing a chapel there.[1] In the Stirling customs' accounts Alexander Gulde, one of the custumars, credits himself with sums averaging £70 a year spent on the castle;[2] but in the accounts rendered by him as master of works in 1434 and 1435, his outlay is less.[3] Smaller payments occur elsewhere for supplies of Baltic timber for Stirling;[4] and there are payments for wine, bread, soap, and wax for the chapel, and phials for the altar.[5]

Since David II. had restored Edinburgh Castle and constructed the great tower there which bore his name, the buildings had been kept up and added to by succeeding Kings. Under Albany £64, 17s. 6d., and afterwards £2, 19s. 3d., were spent on a new kitchen, and £70 at once on other repairs:[6] and there is a payment of 16s. for beams (tigna) for stairs, which we must infer were of timber and not of stone. In 1426, £10 were paid to Walter Spot as master of the works, and £100 to his successor Walter Masoun,[7] besides payments for boards for the same work, and carriage of them by ship to Leith, and thence to Edinburgh.[8]

In the accounts of 1434, mention is made of the repair of a kitchen for the Duke of Rothesay, as well as the rebuilding of the porter's lodge and kitchen of the Captain, and renewing the locks;[1] and in the following year £8 is paid for, inter alia, the completion of a vegetable garden within the precincts of the Castle (herbarii regis infra castrum de Edinburgh).[2] In 1435 and 1436, Robert Gray, the moneyer, was also master of the works of Edinburgh Castle, and in the latter year his expenditure in that capacity was £88, 6s. 7d.[3]

The King's work at Leith, which was at once a lodging for the King, a shipbuilding establishment, a workshop, and a storehouse, and is often noticed in records of a later date, originated in this reign. Unless this building be the "fabrica regis"—so named without further explanation—for slates for which William Law is paid £20 in the Dundee customs' account of 1428,[4] the first notice of it is in 1434, when £42 were paid to George of Foula for 30 wawis of iron sent from Kirkcudbright for the King's works at Leith and Linlithgow.[5] Robert Gray, in addition to the offices of moneyer and master of the works at Edinburgh Castle, held that of master of the works "bargie et palacii de Leith;"[6] and in his account of 1435 he credits himself with £199, 13s. 11d. expended "pro fabrica domorum regis apud Leith."[7]

Ships of the King are frequently mentioned. In 1425, £40 were paid for a ship bought at Dundee from David of Aberkerdor and Nicholas Scrymgeour for the King's use.[1] John Ahanna or Hannay, a burgess of Aberdeen,[2] Andrew Baxter,[3] Henry of Crawford,[4] and Thomas Pulti,[5] are all named incidentally as masters of King's ships. A sail for a boat (cujusdam batelle) is furnished to Crawford by the custumars of Dundee in 1428.[6] An anchor, price 3s. 8d., is supplied to the ship commanded by Baxter,[7] which is twice alluded to as employed to carry him from Aberdeen to Inverness, for the works going on at the castle there.[8] £10 are paid for two cables delivered to Hannay;[9] and 30s. to Hannay for his expenses bringing a barge (navem parvam videlicet bargiam) from Dundee to Leith.[10] In 1431, 35s. are paid for the "sclytting"(?) of a barge of the King,[11] and £10, 4s. at Inverkeithing for the fifth part of the timber of a ship, that is, 172 pieces of wood.[12] In 1435, Thomas Bullok, ship's captain, is paid £10, 10s. for the freight of 120 wawis of iron from Kirkcudbright to Dumbarton.[13] shipbuilding which was then going on at the works at Leith. During the past year £122, 2s. 9½d. had been paid for making a barge for the King, and £25, 18s. 4d. for making a new little ship for the Queen; £43, 8s. 10d. had been paid for repair of a certain ship of the King, and victuals of its sailors going north to fetch timber for the barge in question; £36, 2s. 6d. for the repair of another ship called "Kele," with the wages and victuals of sailors fetching timber as above; and the costs of James Johnson (who elsewhere appears as the receiver of an annuity of 20 marks)[1] and his sailors, bringing from Zealand a mast for the King's great barge, amount to £49, 18s. 3d. Among Gray's items of charge are £2 by sale of the mast of a little ship of the King.[2] The commissars of Montrose credit themselves with a payment of 48 nobles out of the subsidy to Gray towards the building of the King's great ship.[3]

The King's passage by sea to the Isles in 1429[4] was in one of his own ships: but there were of course no ships of war properly so called in these days, and the King's ships were principally employed in exporting the wool and hides of the Crown lands to Flanders.

The trade of Scotland occupied much of James's attention. Though Scotland had also commercial dealings with England, Prussia, Lombardy, and

[1] Page 575.
[2] Page 626.
[3] Page 666.
[4] Page 511.

Spain, the chief trade of the country had long been with the Low Countries. Advantageous terms offered by John Duke of Burgundy and the municipality of Bruges in the beginning of Albany's regency led to that town becoming the only staple port of Scotland: but in the course of time the treatment of the Scottish merchants became the subject of so much complaint that James, soon after his return, removed the trade of the country to Middleburgh in Zealand. Bower tells us of two ambassadors from Flanders being at St Andrews in March 1425–6 :[1] and in December 1427, by a commercial treaty to subsist for a hundred years, the Duke of Burgundy removed the cause of offence by renouncing the right to grant letters of marque, and the Scottish trade was allowed to return to Bruges.[2]

But James I. not only gave encouragement to commerce, but traded to a considerable extent on his own account. The wool and hides of the Crown lands, instead of being disposed of to Scottish merchants, were directly exported by the King to Flanders duty free. In the year ending May 1428 the remissions of custom show the King to have exported wool and hides representing a value of nearly £900.[3] The ship "Mary" of Leith, the property of David Lindsay of Scotland, freighted with various kinds of merchandise belonging to King James of Scotland, obtained in July 1426 a safe conduct from Henry VI. to unload her goods and expose them for sale in the port of London;[1] but we are not informed of the nature of her cargo.

There is a species of transaction with English and foreign merchants which recurs frequently in the accounts. Traders commissioned to bring merchandise from London or from abroad are paid partly in money, but largely also in salted salmon purchased for them by the king at Montrose, Aberdeen or Banff, in remissions of custom on the salmon in question, and in permission to export what wool they buy in Scotland duty free. Prominent among these merchants are the names of John or Jenkin Lemman of London with his servant Watkin Bruk, Thomas Bernwale and Thomas Weston of London, the brothers Peregrine and Lazarin Grill or Grellus of Genoa, and Dominic de Villanis, a Florentine merchant settled in London, with Jenkin Strenkschame his servant.[2] In the extant accounts, regarding which it must be remembered five out of the thirteen years of James's reign are an entire blank, Lemman receives in these different shapes £1572, Bernwale £374, the brothers Grellus £837, and Villanis £816.

The expenses of James's court were on a liberal scale. The accounts tell us of very large supplies of salmon for the royal household,[1] as also of presents of salmon to the Duchess of Clarence, mother of the Queen, and an attendant of the Queen called Marjory Norton.[2]

The already mentioned native of the Low Countries who appears in the rolls under the designation of "John Ducheman, servant of the King," received from 1426 to 1429 the greater part of the custom of the King's wool, and was entrusted in addition with large sums, not only from the customs but from the subsidy raised for the King's ransom, to make purchases for the King in Flanders, the payments being made to Ducheman's servant Alexander Arrowis in his absence. In the three years ending March 1429–30 his receipts in the customs' accounts amount to £676, 7s. 8d., and 2215 nobles are paid him from the subsidy. Still larger payments for similar purposes are made from both sources to John Turyne, a leading Edinburgh merchant, to whom allusion has already been made. In the Edinburgh customs' accounts of 1426, 1428, and 1429, Turyne is credited with sums spent for furnishings to the King, of which we have no details, amounting in all to £413, 2s. 4d.[1] He gets £907 from the customs of Edinburgh in March 1429–30,[2] of which we have his account,[3] rendered along with his account of no less than £3273, 5s. 5d. Flemish from the tax, nearly a fifth of the whole produce of it, and equal to about £6546, 10s. 10d. Scots.

The details of the expenditure of this latter sum, so far as Turyne's account furnishes us with them, are of considerable value and interest. They are given in Flemish money, about double the value of Scotch. £1232, 10s. 8d. were spent in furnishings of which the particulars have not been preserved;[4] and John Ducheman got £227, 12s. 8d., that sum including his travelling expenses,[5] and those of Arrowis sent three times to Flanders.[6] The remainder was partly expended for national objects and in works of public utility, but greatly also in necessaries and luxuries for the court.

Among the former class of items were the embassies to Rome already alluded to,[7] towards which at least £165 were paid, and the casting of pieces of artillery. Small pieces of ordnance had begun to be used in Scotland in the reign of Robert II.; but bombards for siege operations seem to have been first introduced by James I. £590, 8s. 2d. were advanced by Turyne to Nicholas Plummer, designed servant of the King, who worked in more metals than lead,[1] to pay workmen engaged under Plummer's supervision in constructing bombards and other military engines.[2] James's agent in Flanders got into a difficulty regarding the transport of these engines. One John Halewatter, a ship's captain, averred that an engagement had been made with him to transmit them to Scotland for no less a sum than £180 Flemish, to which sum he laid claim, though they had eventually not been sent in his vessel. £8 were paid to Master John Mill and Master Baldwin Poil for extricating Turyne from this difficulty, and obtaining letters patent from the town of Bruges exonerating the King of Scots from Halewatter's claim ;[3] £20 were however paid to Halewatter for the transport of certain other engines to Scotland ;[4] £13, 6s. 8d. were paid for custom (Flemish duty) on said engines ; and for the "scouting"—freight of a barge or "scoute," and putting the engines on board the barge, with drink money to the sailors, there is a further charge of £4, 10s.[5] Bower tells us that James I. brought from Flanders in 1430 a great brass bombard (immanem fundam bombardicam æris metallo fabrifactam) which bore the name of the "Lion."[6] This is probably one of the engines alluded to, and the one specified as the great bombard, in respect of which Turyne had to pay £8 for damage done to a jar of the wine called garnage when it was put on board ship.[1]

There were further £25 worth of military equipments sent home in the ship "Peter Dunkar," and transmitted by Turyne's wife to the Constable of Edinburgh Castle, where they were lodged in the armoury, namely, ten pipes and a roundle containing ten full suits of armour.[2]

Among items of expenditure for the King and royal household were the following:—£20 for Rhine wine bought at Dordrecht;[3] £8, 7s. 6d. for a 15½ gallon jar of Rhine wine;[4] £49, 11s. 7d. for two roundles of spices;[5] £8 paid to Giles, the tapestrymen at Bruges, for manufacturing cloth of arras (pannos de attrabato);[6] and £8 paid by the King's desire to a Flemish shoemaker for hides and his equipment for Scotland.[7]

A consignment of goods was sent under charge of Master James Alamanus, a physician, consisting of an ornament of ostrich feathers, two mantles[8] of backs of martin, twenty four Flemish ells of purple velvet at 18s. the ell, with 12 lb. of cotton to pack the whole in.[9] In another consignment were included two mantles of sable (pellium martrix dicti sabill);[10] £5 were expended in cleaning eighty tymmers of fur which had been sent from Scotland for that purpose.[1]

There was sent in charge of Ducheman's servant a "sparver," that is, a canopy or roof including curtains for the King's bed, two pair sheets, and an ounce and three quarters of gold rings.[2]

On another occasion the articles shipped consisted principally of jewellery, and are enumerated as a gold collar with gems and pearls, a neck jewel (monile) called ouche, with a diamond, a gold chain, a gold saltcellar set with pearls, a piece of blue velvet, two tapestries with the arms of the King wrought on them, six score pearls at 22d. each, and eight score at 14d. each, the whole amounting, with custom and costs, to £219, 4s. 3d.[3] Should a question be raised regarding the price of any of these articles, Turyne agrees to refer it to the arbitration of merchants. Eighteen other pearls of greater value, worth 14s. each, were sent in the same ship by Turyne's servant John Leche; and, it is added, "si precium videatur grave, reputet easdem."[4]

A black silk girdle and a gold signet for the King, transmitted together, cost £3. Besides this gold signet, there are two silver seals for the King and Queen, which, including the making of them and the signet,[5] and with the addition of a with any known seals of James I. The original gold matrix of a beautiful signet, found near Kinross in 1829, bears the arms of Scotland impaled with England and France within the Beaufort bordure. There is a slightly foreign character about the workmanship, and the fleurs-de-lis of the tressure all point outwards. But that, according to the usage of those days, it would rather be considered the seal of the Queen than of the King, one would be disposed to identify it with the seal here described. Impressions exist of a remarkably fine Privy Seal of James I., containing the arms of Scotland supported by two lions coué; but, except the perfection of the work, there is nothing indicative of its having been engraved out of Scotland. A beautiful silver matrix exists of a seal, evidently foreign, belonging to one of the James's of Scotland, exhibiting the King on his throne, crowned, robed, with a sceptre, globe, and cross—in Laing's Catalogue it is assigned to James IV.: but the Latinization of Scotland in the legend "Jacobus Dei gracia Escossie rex," is more suggestive of its being of French than of Flemish workmanship.

APPENDIX TO PREFACE.

No. I.

STEWART GENEALOGY.

It is here attempted in some measure to supplement and correct, in the light of the Exchequer rolls and other documents, the common accounts of the children of Robert II., Robert III., and the Duke of Albany: and some notes are added on the issue of Walter eighth High Steward other than Robert II., to some of whom frequent allusions occur in the accounts.

ROBERT II.

Robert II., only child of Walter eighth High Steward by Marjory Bruce, was born in 1316, and acknowledged heir to the throne in the event of the death of Robert I. without issue male in 1318. He became Steward of Scotland on his father's death in 1326. In early youth he took a prominent part in the struggle for national independence; and he was Regent from 1338 to 1341. Sir William Douglas of Liddesdale, who was created Earl of Athole on 18th July 1341,[1] seems to have almost immediately afterwards granted a charter of that earldom to the Steward, which David II. confirmed on 16th February 1341–2.[2] He was made Earl of Strathern c. 1357, and succeeded to the throne on 22d February 1370–1.

When probably not more than twenty years of age, he formed an irregular connection with Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Adam More or Mure of Rowallan, by whom he had a large family. Elizabeth had previously entered into a marriage per verba de præsenti with Hugh of Gifford, when she was but eleven years of age and Gifford nine; but the marriage had never been ratified or consummated: and on 12th October 1344, in anticipation of her intended marriage to the Steward, that bond was dissolved by papal authority.[3] Another papal dispensation, dated 22d November 1347, removed two further canonical impediments to this marriage, which arose from the Steward being related to Elizabeth in the fourth degree of consanguinity, and having had illicit intercourse with a lady related to her in the third and fourth degrees.[4] The marriage took place in 1349.[5] Though there was a provision in the dispensation legitimating the "multitudo prolis utriusque sexus" which had previously been born, it remained a point admitting of doubt among canonists whether such a provision, in the absence of any assertion either of a previous marriage or of ignorance of the impediment, conferred the full status of legitimacy on the offspring.[1]

[3] Theiner's "Vetera Monumenta," p. 284. It thus appears that Buchanan's story of the marriage of Elizabeth Mure to one Gifford after she had borne children to the King, is the distortion and misrepresentation of a fact, rather than the pure fable that it was considered by Ruddiman and Andrew Stuart.

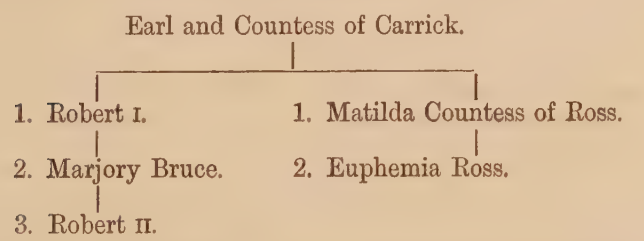
Elizabeth Mure was dead before 1355, in May of which year Robert obtained a dispensation to marry Euphemia, sister of William Earl of Ross, and widow of John Earl of Moray.[2] Euphemia is generally understood to have been daughter of Hugh Earl of Ross by Matilda, sister of King Robert Bruce. Wyntoun, however, on whose authority this statement is supposed to rest, only says that Matilda Bruce was mother of William Earl of Ross, and that Euphemia was his sister.[3] According to the dispensation, Robert and Euphemia were in the fourth degree of consanguinity, and also in the third of affinity. The relationship by affinity is obvious; the Steward and John Earl of Moray both being third from the Earl and Countess of Carrick, the one through Robert I. and Marjory Bruce, the other through Isabel Bruce and Thomas Earl of Moray. But if Euphemia had been daughter of Matilda Bruce, the relationship by consanguinity would have been much nearer than is stated in the dispensation; she would have stood not in the fourth but in the second and third degrees of consanguinity to the Steward. Thus—



Theiner's researches in the Roman records have brought to light a dispensation, of date 24th November 1329, for the marriage of Hugh Earl of Ross with Margaret Graham, granted on the discovery of the parties, long after they were married and had issue, of a canonical impediment, and legitimating their children.[1] Probably Euphemia Ross was one of the issue thus legitimated. She died in 1387.

Any legal doubts regarding the capacity of the first family to succeed to the throne were obviated by the two settlements of the Crown made soon after the accession of Robert II. The second of them, that of 1373, called to the succession the sons of Elizabeth Mure nominatim and their issue male in order, failing them the sons of Euphemia Ross and their issue male, and in default of both the heirs whatsoever of the last heir male. The feeling, however, that the sons whose status was unquestionable had been unjustly postponed to those whose legitimacy was dubious, became the cause of jealousies and of plots, of one of which the assassination of James I. was in part the outcome. The misstatement of historians a few generations later regarding the order of the two marriages needs not be more than adverted to, as it has been long since exposed.

Robert II. had four sons by Elizabeth Mure :—

1. JOHN, afterwards Robert III.

2. WALTER, the second or third husband of Isabel Countess of Fife.[2] The exact date of their marriage is not known. He is generally said to have died in 1360; but it would rather seem that he was alive on 14th August 1362, as there is a payment in the rolls of that date, "Waltero Senescalli domino de Fyff," without the qualifying adverb "quondam."[1]

[1] Theiner's "Vetera Monumenta," p. 249. As widow of the Earl of Ross, Margaret Graham had in 1341 a dispensation to marry John of Berclay (Ibid. p. 276).

[2] That lady, the last of the line of the second race of Earls of Fife, had four if not five husbands within a singularly short space of time, survived them all, and died without leaving issue. Her first husband was William Ramsay of Colluthie, to whom, as Earl of Fife, there are various payments in the accounts of the sheriffs rendered in March 1359–60 (vol. i. pages 602, 603, 606, 608); and there is mention in the same roll of a son of the Earl of Fife, apparently the same William Ramsay, though probably not by the Countess (vol. i.

3. ROBERT Duke of Albany.

4. ALEXANDER, known as the "Wolf of Badenach." He had charters of Badenach with the Castle of Lochindorb, 30th March 1371, and of Strathavon on 17th June following.[2] On 7th October 1372 he was made King's lieutenant from the border of Moray northwards;[3] and he also held the office of Justiciary north of the Forth. On 9th February 1376–7 and 18th October 1379 he had various charters of lands in Banffshire, Sutherlandshire, Inverness-shire, and Aberdeenshire.[4] In or shortly before 1382 he married Euphemia Countess of Ross, daughter of William Earl of Ross, and widow of Sir Walter Lesley. That lady and her predecessors had come to possess one half the lands of the earldom of Buchan, in consequence of the marriage of the brother of a former Earl with the younger daughter of Earl John Comyn; and on her marriage she resigned these lands (designed the barony of Kynedward) to the King, who, on 22d July 1382, re-page 609).~ Among the dispensations brought to light by Theiner, one for the marriage of David of Berclay with Elizabeth (a name then often used interchangeably with Isabel) Countess of Fife, on 27th June 1358, suggests that the marriage with Ramsay, who was then alive, must have been dissolved by divorce. The Countess' marriage with Walter Stewart and his death must have soon followed. On 10th January 1362–3, Sir Thomas Byset of Upsetlington granted the Countess of Fife an antenuptial charter of certain lands, which David II. confirmed in 1364 (Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 44). In April 1363, Byset had a charter of the earldom of Fife to himself and the issue of his marriage with the Countess (Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 31). Her last husband seems to have been John of Dunbar (Robertson's Index, p. 52, No. 4).

granted them to her and her husband Sir Alexander Stewart,[1] who from that date forward is called Earl of Buchan. Three days later he had (as Earl of Buchan) charters confirming grants to him by his wife of the earldom of Ross, and of extensive lordships and baronies, including the islands of Skye and Lewis, lands in Caithness, Sutherland, Athole, Fife, Galloway, the thanage of Glendowachy, etc.;[2] and other charters to him by Robert II. are to be found in the public records. From Robert III. he had a charter of the Castlehill of Inverness.[3] Having deserted his wife for "Mariota filia Athyn," he was, on 2d November 1389, ordained by the Bishop of Moray and Ross to live with her, and became bound not to maltreat her, under a penalty of £200.[4] The office of Justiciary was taken from him in 1389;[5] and the burning by him of Forres and Elgin are among the events of 1390. He died 24th July 1394, leaving no lawful issue; and was buried in the choir of Dunkeld Cathedral. He had several natural children; including Alexander Earl of Mar, whose career has been sketched above; Duncan, who, according to Bower, was leader of the troop of Highlanders who in 1391 made an incursion into Angus; Sir Andrew, knighted in the service of the Duke of Burgundy,[6] who got Sandhalch and Colquhorsy from his brother the Earl of Mar; Walter of Kincardine in Speyside; and James; as also a daughter Margaret.

By Euphemia Ross Robert II. had two sons,—

1. DAVID, who was under age when his father became King, as appears from the Act of Settlement of 1373.[1] Robert II., immediately after his accession, bestowed on him the earldom of Strathern, with remainder to heirs general, as explained on page cxvi. He had a charter on 19th June 1371 of the Castle and barony of Urquhart;[2] on 21st March 1374–5 of the Castle of Brathewell (Braal), with the other lands in the earldom of Caithness and elsewhere that had belonged to Alexander of Arde in right of Matilda of Strathern his mother;[3] and in a charter dated 14th February 1380–1 he is called Earl Palatine of Strathern and Caithness.[4] Whom he married is unknown. He was alive in February 1381–2, when he had a safe conduct to come to England with forty horse;[5] and he must have died between that date and 1389. He left a daughter Euphemia, designed Countess Palatine of Strathern in 1389,[6] who about 1402 resigned the earldom of Caithness in favour of her uncle Walter Earl of Athole. She married, first, Patrick Graham, son of Sir Patrick Graham of Dundaff and Kincardine by his second wife Egidia, daughter of Sir John Stewart of Ralstoun, who was slain by his brother-in-law Sir John Drummond at Crieff in 1413; and afterwards Sir Patrick Dunbar of Bele, son of George Earl of March.[7] By the former marriage she had, besides two daughters, a son, Malise, who, inheriting the earldom of Strathern, was deprived of it on the pretext of its being a male fief.

2. Walter.—It may perhaps be surmised, from his bearing the same Christian name, that he was born after the death of his half-brother the Earl of Fife, which seems to have occurred in 1362: but he was certainly married to Margaret, daughter and heir of Sir David Barclay of Brechin, as early as 19th October 1378, when he granted in the Parliament at Scone a charter of half the lands of Arroch in the lordship of Brechin to Thomas Rate, a grant which the King confirmed a few days later.[1] A small payment was made to him as lord of Brechin by gift of the King in February 1388–9;[2] and he is always similarly designed down to 1401. At the audits of 1389–90, 1390–1, and 1391–2 occur three payments from the customs of Dunbar to the Earl of March, amounting collectively to £246, 3s. 7d., for damage done to his lands of Kilconquhar by the lord of Brechin, and in respect of wool and hides abstracted by him.[3] As having the ward of the son and heir of Sir Andrew Mercer, he drew the annuity which Mercer had enjoyed from the fermes and customs of Perth;[4] and after the majority of Michael Mercer he sometimes granted the receipt for the termly payments.[5] About 1390 and in following years he was employed in expeditions beyond the Mounth, undertaken in the hope of reducing the Highlands to order.[6] From 1398 onwards an annuity of 50 marks was paid him from the customs of Edinburgh for retinue to his brother Robert III.,[7] and in 1398 and 1400 he received 100 marks as keeper of Edinburgh Castle.[8] He had a charter of the earldom of Caithness on the resignation of his niece Euphemia;[9] and the earldom of Athole (which had reverted to the Crown on the death of the Duke of Rothesay, and afterwards been possessed, for the lifetime of Robert III. only, by the Duke of Albany) was also conferred on him. In July 1402 and March 1406 he is designed in the rolls Earl of Caithness;[1] in May 1409 and always afterwards Earl of Athole.[2] During Albany's regency he often granted receipts for payments made to his niece Egidia Stewart, daughter of Robert III.[3] After James's return to Scotland, we encounter his name as the recipient of gifts and remissions of custom:[4] and he had the earldom of Strathern conferred on him for life on 22nd July 1427.[5] On the 31st March 1437 he suffered the penalty of treason as the murderer of his nephew and Sovereign, when his head was fixed on a spear and encircled with a mock crown. He had two sons,—1. James, a hostage for James I., who died in England, leaving a son Sir Robert Stewart, Master of Athole, private chamberlain of James I. to whom a dispensation was granted in February 1429 to marry Margaret of Ogilvy,[6] and who, as one of the conspirators against James I., was executed along with his grandfather. 2. Alan, in whose favour his father resigned the earldom of Caithness, and who was killed in the encounter with Donald Balloch at Inverlochy in 1431, leaving no issue.

The existing accounts of the daughters of Robert II. are obviously in many respects inaccurate, particularly so in the almost arbitrary separation of the issue of the two marriages: and the present enumeration professes to do no more than supply some materials for their emendation. While the dispensation for the marriage of Elizabeth Mure alludes to her multitudinous offspring of both sexes, we know that Euphemia Ross had been ten years a widow when she married the Steward; the presumption is therefore rather against her issue having been equally numerous.

1. MARGARET, second wife of John Lord of the Isles, was probably among the eldest children of the first family. The dispensation for her marriage is dated 14th June 1350,[1] only two years and half after that for the marriage of her mother. Their son Donald was named as a hostage by his father in 1369.[2]

2. ELIZABETH, who must also have been of the first family, married Thomas of Hay, Constable of Scotland. On 7th September 1372, Robert II. granted an annuity to Thomas of Hay and Elizabeth the King's daughter, and the children born and to be born of them.[3]

3. A daughter of the first marriage, name unknown, seems to have married Sir John of Keith, eldest son of William of Keith, Marischal. A charter was granted by Robert II., on 17th January 1373–4, "dilecto filio nostro Johanni de Keth," of the lands, possessions, and offices of Sir William of Keith, his father.[4] In 1395, according to Wyntoun,[5] the son and heir of this marriage besieged his aunt, the wife of Sir James of Lindsay, at Fivy, and afterwards fought with Lindsay at Kirk of Bourtie. The hero of this exploit, being described as "a mychty man," could scarcely at its date have been under twenty-five; and, if so, his mother could not have been, as generally alleged, a daughter of the King's second marriage.

4. MARJORY, who married, by dispensation dated 11 June 1370, John Dunbar Earl of Moray,[6] was doubtless also one of the first family. She had issue.

5. ISABEL, married,—first, in terms of arrangement made at the time of Robert's accession, James Earl of Douglas, who fell in 1388 at Otterburn, by whom she had no issue. The dispensation is dated 24th September 1371,[1] and calls her Margaret, though there is abundant evidence of her name being Isabel, while Margaret was the name of her elder sister, the wife of the Lord of the Isles. Secondly, in 1390, Sir John Edmonstone, by whom she had a son. There is a payment of £500 in the accounts of the Chamberlain rendered February 1373–4 to William Earl of Douglas, in terms of the marriage contract between his son and Isabel daughter of the King.[2] In the Chartulary of Kelso there is a precept by Robert II. to the sheriff of Selkirk, of date 28 September 1388, to give Isabel, widow of James Earl of Douglas, her terce of all his lands within his jurisdiction.[3] According to George Crawford, who had examined the original in the Ednam charter chest, a charter of Robert III., of date 25th April 1392, confirmed a charter of Robert II. to Sir John of Edmonstone and Isabel Countess of Douglas, his wife, of the lands of Ednam.[4] One third of an annuity of 200 marks which the Earl of Douglas had had from the customs of Haddington, was paid to Sir John of Edmonstone, as husband of his widow, from 1390 to the death of the latter.[5] In the Haddington account rendered 22nd July 1410 she is called Stewarts," p. 439. The impediment stated in consanguinity is the fourth degree. Each was fourth from the Earl and Countess of Carrick, Marjory Stewart through King Robert I., Marjory Bruce, and Robert II.; John Earl of Moray through Isabel Bruce, Thomas Earl of Moray, and Agnes Countess of March.

"quondam comitissa de Douglas."[1] The Countess of Douglas has been enumerated among the daughters of Euphemia Ross, apparently for no better reason than because Wyntoun, either in search of a rhyme for the word "wed," or because Robert II. had a large bastard issue, calls her "The Kingis dochtyr of lawchful bed."[2] It is certain, however, that Wyntoun had no intention of thus bastardizing by implication the first family, whose full legitimacy he everywhere else recognises: this meaning was first attached to his words by Boece, who also supplied the lady with the name of Euphemia after her supposed mother. As none of the daughters of Euphemia Ross could have come to maturity when Robert succeeded, it would seem at least as likely that she was a daughter of Elizabeth Mure.

6. JEAN, married,—first, probably earlier than 1379 (the year given in the Peerages), Sir John Lyon, Secretary to Robert II., and afterwards Chamberlain, who was assassinated on 4th November 1382. Secondly, c. 1383, Sir James Sandilands of Calder, who had a charter from Robert II., on 4th November (no year given, probably 1383) to himself, "et Johanne filie nostre karissime," whom he is to marry.[3] They had another charter on 2d May 1384, with limitation to their heirs "procreatis et procreandis."[4] Jean is said by Hume of Godscroft to have been a daughter of Elizabeth Mure.[5]

7. EGIDIA, the fame of whose beauty led the King of France to make an offer for her hand, and to send a painter to Scotland to take her likeness. The Princess, however, had already disposed of her heart to one of the most famous knights and warriors of the day, Sir William Douglas of Nithsdale, natural son of Archibald third Earl of Douglas, whom she married in 1387.[1] An annuity of £300 was granted to Douglas and the King's daughter Egidia, on their marriage, out of the customs of Edinburgh, Linlithgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen.[2] The year of the charter is mutilated in the record, but its date is proved by the payments under it in the rolls, which begin in 1388.[3] Douglas was assassinated at Dantzic in 1389, according to Bower;[4] but the Exchequer accounts seem to indicate that his death occurred in 1391 or 1392, and was not known in Scotland in March 1391–92.[5] Egidia, though commonly enumerated among the children of Elizabeth Mure, must have been a daughter of Euphemia Ross. Had she been by the first marriage, her charms would have been somewhat mature in 1389.

8. Another daughter was wife of Sir David Lindsay, first Earl of Crawford. It is not very clear what her Christian name was: she has been variously called Jean, Katherine, and Elizabeth, by different genealogists. She also seems to have been of the second family, and not, as generally represented, of the first; if of the first, she was greatly older than her husband. No evidence is known to exist of the exact date of the marriage, but it cannot have been after 1384, as in a charter of that year Lindsay is called the King's son.[6]

If we are to suppose (as the Earl of Crawford does in his "Lives of the Lindsays," vol. i. p. 51), the conveyance of Glenesk in 1365 by his mother to his father was of the date of their marriage, he could not have been born earlier than 1366, and must have been married at eighteen. If again Lord Crawford is right in supposing that Strathnairn was Sir David Lindsay's dowry, his marriage with the Princess is thrown back to 1381, in which year £105 are paid to Lindsay for that year's rents of Strathnairn, let to the King's son Alexander (vol. iii. page 67).

A daughter of the King is said by Duncan Stewart[1] to have married Sir Robert Logan, reference being made in a footnote to a charter of Robert III. "Roberto Logane, militi, fratri nostro," dated 1395. Stewart, however, does not say that he had seen this charter, or indicate on whose authority it rests. In the account of Lennox and Menteith a payment occurs "domine Katerine Logane,"[2] who may perhaps be supposed to be the lady in question. This marriage may, on the other hand, have been a conjectural way of accounting for a grant which occurs in the Privy Seal Record of James IV., of date 29th December 1537, of a pension of forty marks to Janet Logan, widow of John Wallace of Cragy, in consideration of her being "of our kin and blude," and having been "dotit substantiouslie" by James III.,[3] an entry more satisfactorily explained by the statement in a manuscript pedigree of the Stewart family, written at a time when the matter was comparatively recent,[4] that James III. had an illegitimate daughter married to Logan of Restalrig, whose daughter the annuitant may be supposed to have been.

Robert II. had a considerable number of illegitimate sons, among whom were—occur remissions of custom from 1384 to 1402.[1] He had a safe conduct to England on 30th November 1395.[2] A man, according to Bower, "of the most modest spirit and a dovelike simplicity,"[3] he was elected Bishop of St Andrews in 1401, but declined the office.

John Stewart, ancestor of the Bute family, constituted by his father heritable sheriff of Bute, to whom reference will have to be made in the Preface to the succeeding volume.

Sir John Stewart of Dundonald, known as the "Red Stewart." In 1402 he succeeded Sir John Stewart of Jedworth in the office of Clerk of Audit, which he held till the death of Robert III. He was usually among the Exchequer auditors from 1402 to 1408, and appears as recipient of annuities from the customs of Edinburgh, Linlithgow, and Perth, down to James's return from England.[5] He married Elizabeth, daughter of William Lord of Graham.[6] He was knighted at the coronation of James,[7] was afterwards keeper of Dumbarton Castle, and met his death at Dumbarton in 1425, at the hands of James Stewart, son of Murdach Duke of Albany. He is perhaps to be identified with John Stewart, to whom, as "dilecto filio nostro genito inter nos et dilectam nostram Moram," Ballachys, Invernate, and Mukirsy, in the thanage of Kinclevin, were conveyed by a charter of date 15th January 1382–3, with remainders in succession to James, Alexander, and John, the King's sons by Mariot Cardney.[8]

[8] Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 166. Sir John Stewart of Dundonald is called by Bower (Scotichronicon, l. xvi. c. 10) "alias de Burle:" and Burleigh, which was one of the subjects conveyed by the King to Mariot Card-

Mariot, daughter of John Cardney of that ilk, sister of Robert Cardney, Bishop of Dunkeld, and mistress of the King, had in the year 1372 two charters, with remainder to her children by the King, whom failing to her lawful heirs. By the one were conveyed to her the lands of Tolyry, Burelly (Burleigh), Easter Ballingall, Schenevall, and Milnathort, in the sheriffdom of Kinross; by the other the two Clyntres, Weltoun, and Watertoun in Aberdeenshire.[1] There are payments and furnishings to her in the accounts of 1380.[2] Several charters to the King's children by her, granted in 1378 and 1382–3, occur in the records. She had certainly three, and apparently four sons by the King:—

Alexander Stewart, who on 3th January 1377–8 had, on resignation of Richard Mowat, a charter of Inverlunan in Forfarshire, erected into a barony, with remainders, failing his issue, to James and John Stewart, also designed sons of the King by Mariot Cardney;[3] and on 15th January 1382–3, a charter of Lunan, also on resignation of Richard Mowat, and of Pitfour in Buchan, the order of substitution in this instance being first to James and then to John.[4] There are remainders to Alexander in charters granted to his brothers James and John of the same date.

ney and her issue, was in the next generation possessed, along with Pitfour, also a grant to Mariot's sons, by Walter Stewart. Yet it seems certain that Sir John Stewart of Dundonald was not a son of Mariot. That he was not identical with Sir John Stewart of Cardney appears from the mention of both together in the "Extracta e variis Cronicis Scocie" (p. 227), and by Bower (Scotichronicon, l. xvi. c. 10); and it is scarcely consistent with the charters alluded to in the text that two sons of the King by Mariot Cardney bore the name of John.

Pitfour is said, in the Exchequer accounts of 1454, to be in the hands of the Crown by death of Sir Walter Stewart of Burle, vol. v. p. 654. In

James Stewart, who obtained on 25th December 1372 a grant of the reversion to an annuity from Abernethy enjoyed by Margaret Countess of Angus.[1] He had, on 15th January 1382–3, a charter of the east half of Kinfauns, Rate, and Mill of Forteviot, containing remainders to his brother Alexander and John.[2] In the Chamberlain's account of 1391 a payment occurs to James and John Stewart, the King's brothers.[3]

Sir John Stewart of Cardney.—On 15th January 1382–3, John Stewart, the King's son by Mariot Cardney, had a charter of Kinclevin, Ervyntoly (Arntully), Tulibeltyn, and Dulmernok, with remainders to his full brothers Alexander and James.[4] In the Chamberlain's account of 1394 occurs a payment of £10 to Master Robert of Cardney, to the expenses of the King's brother John Stewart, studying at Paris.[5] There are remainders to this John Stewart in the above mentioned charters of 1378 and 1382–3 granted to his full brothers James and Alexander, and his half-brother John. Robert III. granted a charter of the two Cardneys in Perthshire to his brother John Stewart,[6] which is said by Duncan Stewart to have been dated 12th February 1399, and to have contained a reversion to a younger brother named Walter.[7] Sir John Stewart of Cardney was made a knight at the coronation of James I.[8] Arntully and Cardney continued to be possessed by his descendants.

Stewart there is said to have been a reversion to his brother Walter, whom failing to the Crown. The absence of all mention of Walter in the charters of January 1382–3 seems to suggest that he was not born till after their date.

ROBERT III.

JOHN, eldest son of Robert II. and Elizabeth Mure, must have been born about 1337. In or very shortly before 1367 he married Annabella, daughter of John Drummond of Stobhall. On 3d May of that year he had, under the designation of John Stewart of Kyle, a charter from David II., on his father's resignation, of the earldom of Athole, to himself and his wife Annabella and the heirs male of their body, whom failing to his issue male, whom failing to his father and his heirs.[1] He had, also from David II., a charter of the earldom of Carrick to himself, his wife, and their heirs, on 22d June 1368,[2] and another charter of the same earldom from his father on 1st June 1374.[3] He succeeded to the throne on 19th April 1390, when he took the name of Robert. His Queen died in 1401, and himself on 4th April 1406. They had issue three sons and four daughters:—

[1] A copy of this charter in the Harleian MSS. 4695, gives the date 3d May of the 37th year of David II., i.e. 1367 as above, which is doubtless correct. In an abstract of the same document in a handwriting of the 17th century, to be found elsewhere in the Harleian MSS., Edinburgh Castle is mentioned as the place of its deposit, and the date is given 31st May 1337, which is obviously wrong. Abercromby ("Martial Achievements of the Scottish Nation," ii. p. 157), who perhaps knew of the charter through this abstract, and corrected the date conjecturally, dates it 31st May 1357; and all later writers have in consequence assigned the marriage to that year, notwithstanding the palpable unlikelihood of Queen Annabella having been 37 years married when she became mother of James I.

1. DAVID, Steward of Scotland; born 1378, and made Earl of Carrick on his father's accession to the throne. He had an annuity of £640 from the customs, apportioned between nine burghs. He was created Duke of Rothesay on 28th April 1398; got the earldom of Athole by charter from his father on 6th September of same year;[1] and married at Bothwell, in 1400, Mary, daughter of Archibald third Earl of Douglas.[2] On the forfeiture of George Earl of March that earldom was conferred on him;[3] and he died without issue in Falkland Castle on 26th March 1402. His widow, in 1403, married Walter of Haliburton.[4] The Duke of Rothesay's annuity was claimed as due to the Duchess during her widowhood and second marriage, and received from time to time by Haliburton;[5] but her right to it seems to have been considered doubtful; and on various occasions sums were taken by violence from the custumars on the pretext of being in payment of it.[6] She died c. 1420.[7]

2. ROBERT.—It appears from the accounts of 1392, that the annuity from the customs granted to the Earl of [3] This is stated in the account of the earldom of March in an Exchequer Roll of 1455.

[4] This marriage is noticed in no existing account of either Stewarts, Douglases, or Haliburtons. In the recognised Haliburton pedigree, two generations are made into one. Walter Haliburton of Dirleton, mentioned in the rolls during Albany's regency (page 177, 203, 602), was husband of Albany's daughter, the Countess of Ross, at the time when the Walter who imprisoned the custumars of Linlithgow in the island fortress of the family (page 320) was husband of the Duchess of Rothesay. They seem to have been father and son; and it was the latter who was afterwards Treasurer.

Carrick (Duke of Rothesay) had a remainder to his brother Robert.[1] The annuity of 200 marks from the customs granted by Robert III. to his brother the Earl of Fife, on 8th February 1392–3, bears to be for retinue to David Earl of Carrick, whom failing "Roberto Senescalli, militi, filio nostro dilecto."[2]

3. JAMES I., born 1394, captured by the English about the end of February 1405–6; returned to Scotland 9th April 1424; married, February 1423–4, Joan, daughter of John Earl of Somerset; murdered 20th February 1436–7. His widow in 1439 remarried Sir James Stewart, son of Sir James Stewart of Innermeath and Lorn, and died 15th July 1449. The issue of James and his Queen were Margaret, who married, 6th July 1436, Louis Dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XI., and died in August 1445; Elizabeth, otherwise called Isabel, who married, 30th October 1442, Francis Count of Montfort, afterwards Duke of Bretagne, and surviving her husband forty-four years, died in 1494; Alexander and James, twins, born 16th October 1430, of whom the former died in infancy, the latter succeeded his father as James II.; Joan or Janet, who married James Douglas of Dalkeith, created Earl of Morton 14th March 1457–8; Eleanor, who in 1449 married the Archduke Sigismund of Austria, and died 1480; Mary, married to Wolfart van Borselen, Count of Grandpré and Lord of Campvere in Zealand, and in his wife's right Earl of Buchan in Scotland; and Annabella, married to George Earl of Huntly.

1. MARGARET, married Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas, who was created Duke of Touraine in France, in 1424, and fell the same year at Verneuil. The accounts of March 1405–6 and March 1406–7 contain payments in virtue of a grant under the Privy Seal of part of the customs of the wool of Galloway, Nithsdale, and Douglasdale (that is, of the domains of the Earl of Douglas) to the Lady Egidia, daughter of Robert III.,[1] and in the earlier entry the payment is said to be by "per literas comitisse de Douglas de recepto." These entries certainly tend to suggest the identity of the King's daughter Egidia, whose name occurs in none of the accepted genealogies of the royal house, with the Countess of Douglas. On the other hand, in the various recorded charters granted under the Great Seal by James I. to his sister the Duchess of Touraine, Countess of Douglas and Lady of Galloway, she is uniformly called Margaret;[2] and it is difficult to believe the same lady to have borne both Christian names.[3] After James's return, various payments and remissions of custom occur to the Countess of Douglas,[4] on one occasion designated Duchess of Touraine,[5] but without mention of her Christian name.

2. MARY, who had four husbands, and families by each. She married,—first, in 1397, George Douglas Earl of Angus (illegitimate son of William, first Earl of Douglas, and Margaret Stewart, Countess of Angus), when her father bestowed on her the lands of Abernethy and Bonhill, with the issues of the justice ayres in the sheriffdom of Forfar.[6] The subsequent Earls of Angus were descended from this marriage. Secondly, in 1409, Sir James Kennedy, son and apparent heir of Sir Gilbert Kennedy of Dunure, when she got the barony of Dalrymple as her dower. Allusion is made in the Lennox account of 1434 to the eldest son of this marriage,[1] who was on some ground not now known imprisoned in Stirling Castle; the second son was ancestor of the Ailsa family; the third son was the eminent James Kennedy, Bishop of St Andrews. Thirdly, William Lord of Graham, who died in 1424. From different sons of this marriage sprung the Grahams of Garvock, Balgowan, and Claverhouse; the second son, Patrick Graham, was the first Archbishop of St Andrews. Fourth, in 1425, Sir William Edmonstone of Culloden, on whom James bestowed Duntreath, a portion of the earldom of Lennox,[2] and by whom she was ancestress of the Edmonstones of Duntreath. She was interred at Strathblane church with her fourth husband.

3. ELIZABETH, married Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, son by his first wife, Agnes of Dunbar, of the Sir James Douglas whose second wife was sister of Robert II.[3] Their issue continued the line of Dalkeith. In the accounts of 1397 there is a remission of custom by the King, "domine Elizabeth de Douglas, filie sue."[4]

4. EGIDIA.—Allusion has already been made to the remissions in the accounts of March 1405–6 and March 1406–7, of the custom of the wool of Galloway, Nithsdale, and Douglasdale, to Egidia, daughter of Robert III., which would have seemed to identify Egidia with the Countess of Douglas, but for the latter being called Margaret in several Crown charters. During the regency numerous payments occur to Egidia, daughter of Robert III., by authority of the Governor,[5] sometimes said to be for her adornment (pro apparatu suo).[1] In various instances the money is said to be received for her by her uncle (so designed) the Earl of Athole.[2]

Robert III. had two natural sons:—

James Stewart of Kilbride, mentioned in the accounts of 1388 as deforcing the sheriff of Lanark;[3] and in those of 1395 and following years as having the ward of the heir of Sir William of Danyelstoun, in respect of which he receives Danyelstoun's annuity from the customs of Dunbar;[4] and in those of 1400, on receiving part payment from the customs of Edinburgh of a pension, his right to which is called in question by the auditors.[5]

ROBERT DUKE OF ALBANY.

Robert, third son of Robert II. and Elizabeth Mure, was born about 1340. He married,—first, by dispensation dated 9th September 1361,[7] Margaret Countess of Menteith —daughter of the Countess Mary and Sir John Graham, Earl in his wife's right, who was put to death by Edward III. after the battle of Durham—a lady who had already had three previous husbands, John of Moray, Thomas Earl of Mar, and John of Drummond.[8] The dispensation riages also, dated respectively 21st November 1348, 15th August 1352, and 18th April 1360 (Theiner, pp. 290, 300, 315). In the dispensation of 1348, her mother being alive, she is called "Margaret, daughter of John Graham Earl of Menteith;" in that of 1352 "Margaret widow of John of Moray," and in those of 1360 and 1361 "Margaret Countess of Menteith." There can therefore be no doubt that it was the same lady who had all those four husbands within the space of thirteen years.

John Moray of Bothwell was the only known John of Moray of that date, and certainly the only person of that name in a prominent enough position to be likely to marry the Countess: but if he was her first husband, it follows that he was not, as generally maintained, the son but the stepson of Christian Bruce, King Robert's sister. Had he been her son, he would have been uncle of Thomas Earl of Mar, the Countess' second husband, whereas the impediment to her marriage with the latter is said to be a relationship in the third and fourth degrees of affinity. There are additional reasons, apart from this dispensation, for disbelieving that Christian Bruce was mother of John and Thomas Moray of Bothwell. Her first marriage, to Gratney Earl of Mar, can hardly have taken place earlier than 1292. Gratney, by whom she had two children at least, died before 1305: and her son, the heir of Mar who was captured by Edward I. in 1306, is mentioned in the orders regarding Scottish prisoners, not as a young child, but in terms applicable to a boy of twelve or fourteen; he is to be guarded carefully, but not put in irons, in consideration of his youth; and the Bishop of Chester is to see that he has a trustworthy valet, who is to attend him as his master and companion (Scottish Memoranda in the Treasury of the Receipt of the Exchequer, 34 Edw. I. Printed in the Evidence in the Mar Peerage Case, pp. 13, 14.) As the dispensation for Christian's marriage with Andrew Moray of Bothwell is dated 1326, more than thirty years after her marriage to the Earl of Mar, the probability is against there having been any issue. But a stronger argument is derived from the bestowal of the lordship of Garioch by King Robert on Andrew Moray and his sister Christian on their marriage. Had there been any issue, it is presumable that they, rather than Christian's first family, would have inherited that lordship.

No sooner was the Countess of Menteith's first husband, John of Moray, dead, than a dispensation was granted for her marriage with Thomas Earl of Mar. This marriage must have been dissolved by divorce, as the Earl of Mar was afterwards husband of the Countess of Angus, and lived till about 1377.

John Drummond, the third husband of the Countess of Menteith, was father of Queen Annabella, and brother of Queen Margaret Logie.

the diocese of Dunblane. Secondly, Muriella, daughter of Sir William Keith, the Marischal, who, after the fall of the house of Albany, received from James I. and James II. a pension of 100 marks,[1] and died shortly before Whitsunday 1449.[2]

He is designed Robert Stewart of Menteith in the accounts of 1364.[3] He obtained the earldom of Fife by an indenture with the Countess Isabel, widow of his brother Walter, dated 30th March 1371,[4] in which that lady acknowledged him to be her lawful heir, both by tailzie of her father Earl Duncan, to Alan Earl of Menteith, grandfather of Countess Margaret, and by tailzie made by herself and her late husband, and bound herself, when she had recovered the earldom, of which she had denuded herself under compulsion, to resign it in his favour, reserving her own liferent. He was made Duke of Albany on 28th April 1398. The earldom of Athole, which had reverted to the Crown on the death of the Duke of Rothesay, was, by a charter dated 2d September

The dispensation for his marriage, dated 18th April 1360, bears to be granted to put an end to the feud between their relations, but it also mentions that the parties had already contracted marriage in full knowledge of the canonical impediment. There is a clause legitimating children already born of the marriage, who, however, cannot have survived. In the Great Seal Register, of date 30th March 1371 (Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 113), is a confirmation of a grant by Mary Countess of Menteith to John of Drummond of the lands of Roseneath, and of a grant made by Drummond of the same lands to Sir Alexander of Menteith.

Theiner has further (p. 262) brought to light a dispensation granted to Mary of Menteith (mother of the Countess Margaret) and Sir John Graham, of 1st May 1334, narrating that they had before that date married in full knowledge that they were related within the prohibited degrees, sanctioning their union, and legitimating the already born issue.

1403, conferred on him in free regality for the lifetime of Robert III. only, and with a remainder to his son John in case of his predeceasing the King.[1] He was Great Chamberlain from 1383 to 1407; Governor of the Realm during part of the reign of Robert II. and Robert III., and Regent from the death of Robert III. to his own death in 1420.

Robert Duke of Albany had issue by both marriages. Of his first marriage the only son seems to have been—

Sir Murdach, justiciary of Scotland north of the Forth; captured at Homildoun in 1402, restored in 1415 in exchange for the Earl of Northumberland; succeeded his father in 1420 in the dukedom of Albany and in the Regency; beheaded 24th May 1425. He married Isabel, eldest daughter and coheir of Duncan Earl of Lennox, and had issue:—

(1.) Robert, designed "of Fife," who predeceased his father without issue. He was alive in 1416,[2] and probably died shortly before July 1421, when the designation "of Fife" is first given to his brother Walter.[3]

(2.) Sir Walter, designed "of Lennox," and, after his elder brother's death, "of Fife." An annuity of eighty marks was paid him as keeper of Dumbarton Castle.[4] He had a dispensation, of date 24th April 1421, to marry Janet, daughter of Sir Robert Erskine,[5] obtained in the face of the already noticed[6] opposition of Alexander Earl of Mar and Duke Murdach; but it is not positively known whether the marriage took place. There is reason to believe that he had previously a liaison—perhaps a marriage subject to canonical objection—with a lady of the house of Lochow, by whom he had a family.[1] He was executed 24th May 1425. Buchanan relates that his widow and children fled to Ireland along with his brother James at the time of the ruin of the house of Albany; and the same historian in another passage describes Lord Avondale as the son of Walter Stewart.[2] Whether the so-called widow was Janet Erskine or the Campbell lady is not quite apparent. Andrew Lord Avondale, with his brothers Arthur and Walter, had letters of legitimation under the Great Seal on 17th April 1479.[3] The instrument does not indicate who the father of the three brothers was: but there can be no doubt that they were sons of Walter; although modern writers, following George Crawfurd, with whom the error originated, have agreed to call them children of James by a lady of the Macdonald family, with whom he formed a connection in Ireland.[4] Lord Avondale could not have been born after the flight of James Stewart to Ireland, which took place in 1429, else he would not have been above ten in August 1440, when we find him under the designation of Andrew Stewart of Albany, a member of James II.'s council, and party to an important indenture regarding the possession of Kildrummy Castle.[5]

[1] This is asserted in the MS. pedigree alluded to in a previous note (p. clxvi.), the entry standing thus—"Walter=—Campbell, filia militis de Lashow, non legitima uxor."

[4] The confusion has arisen from the occurrence of the names of Andrew and Arthur, along with that of James, an illegitimate son of James Stewart, as witnesses to charters of their grandmother the Duchess of Albany, the common designation "de Albania" being applied to them all.

[5] Acts of the Parliaments of Scot-

But his age, as well as the necessity for a legitimation, show that he at least was not the son of Janet Erskine. At first sight, it might be supposed that the occurrence of the names of Arthur and Walter in the legitimation precluded the idea of either of them having been Janet Erskine's children. But it has been contended by the Hon. and Rev. Andrew Godfrey Stuart, in his "Genealogical and Historical Sketch of the Stuarts of Castlestuart,"[1] that Walter, who seems to have been brought up apart from Andrew and land, ii. p. 56. Even if James had gone to Ireland in 1425, as generally said, his son could not have then been more than fourteen.

[1] To the author of this privately printed work the editor is indebted for first calling his attention to what he must regard as the undoubted true paternity of Lord Avondale and his brothers. Mr Stuart has brought a great deal of careful study and research to bear on the history of the grandchildren of Murdach Duke of Albany; and if his argument for the full legitimacy of Walter, the ancestor of the families of Castlestuart and Moray, is not absolutely convincing, it is at least somewhat plausible. One of the difficulties in the way of accepting his view is connected with the questions that arose during the reign of James III. regarding the Lennox succession. While Lord Avondale, the unquestionably illegitimate grandson of the Duchess Isabel, had interest to obtain a liferent of the whole, the claims of Lord Darnley to one-half and Haldane and Elizabeth Menteith to one-fourth each, in respect of their descent from Isabel's two sisters, seem to imply the non-existence of any lawful issue of Isabel herself. No doubt, by the old treason law of Scotland, Duke Murdach's attainder, unless reversed, would exclude his children from succession to their mother; but, in the words of a high legal authority of the seventeenth century, "it were great rigour to refuse to rehabilitate them" (Sir John Steuart's Answers to "Dirleton's Doubts," p. 123; see also Riddell's "Peerage and Consistorial Law," p. 765); and it is rather surprising, soon after the expiry of Lord Avondale's liferent, to find his nephew Alexander Stewart, the ex hypothesi lawful descendant and representative of the eldest coheiress, not applying for a rehabilitation, or for his third of the Lennox, but homologating the claim of Elizabeth Menteith by attesting the proclamation of the King's letters of Privy Seal in her favour (Napier's "Partition of the Lennox," p. 70). Mr Stuart has forborne to advert to one curious result of his theory, namely, the invalidity of Queen Mary's title to the throne. Under the settlement of 1373, heirs female were only called to the succession on the extinction of all lawful descendants in the male line of Robert II.

Arthur, witnessing none of his grandmother's charters, and is found in possession of the lands of Morphie, belonging shortly before to the Erskines, was son of Janet Erskine, and included in the legitimation to obviate the risk—a real one in the then existing state of the law of marriage and divorce—of doubts being thrown on his status in consequence of his father's previous irregular or uncanonical marriage.

(3.) Sir ALEXANDER, knighted at the coronation of James I.; beheaded 25th May 1425.

(4.) JAMES, who, after his attack on Dumbarton in 1425, escaped, first to England, and then in 1429 to Ireland, where by a lady of the Macdonald family he had a son James, ancestor of the Stuarts of Ardvorlich.

A daughter married Sir Walter Buchanan of that ilk, but does not seem to have been mother of the next representative of that family.[1]

Robert Duke of Albany, by his second marriage, had three sons:—

1. JOHN Earl of Buchan. He had a charter from his father, with consent of Murdach his brother, of Coull and Oneil, with remainder, failing his issue male, to his

[1] According to Buchanan of Auchmar (Account of the Family of Buchanan, p. 41, edit. 1775), a charter granted by Isabel Duchess of Albany of some subjects at Drymen to one Donald Patrick—quoted as in possession of the Buchanans of Drummakil—was witnessed by Sir Walter, laird of Buchanan, designed her son-in-law. According to the same authority, this laird of Buchanan had three sons: Patrick, who succeeded him; Maurice, Treasurer to the Dauphiness (the author, according to Mr W. F. Skene, of the "Liber Pluscardensis"); and Thomas, ancestor of the Buchanans of Carbeth. But the mention in the French account of Jean de Mauléon, quoted by Mr Skene (Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, ix. p. 448; Preface to "Liber Pluscardensis," p. xxi.) of "Maître Morice de Bocanan," as in the suite of Sir John Stewart of Darnley in 1427, is scarcely compatible with his being grandson, or at least with his elder brother being grandson, of Duchess Isabel, whose antenuptial contract of marriage is dated 17th February 1391–2. Here also the same difficulty arises in relation to the partition brothers Andrew and Robert and their issue male successively, which was confirmed by Robert III. on 8th February 1398–9.[1] He had also a charter from his father as Regent on 20th September 1406 of the earldom of Buchan, with the same substitutions.[2] He was made Chamberlain of Scotland by a charter of date 12th March 1406–7 in which he is called "dominus de Buchane,"[3] and he had, on 2nd May 1407, charters from his maternal grandfather and grandmother, William of Keith, Marischal, and Margaret Fraser, of Tulchfraser in Stirlingshire, with the office of sheriff of Stirling, confirmed by

of the Lennox that has been adverted to in the note regarding Walter Stewart of Morphie. If the illegitimacy or dubious legitimacy of the children of Duke Murdach's son Walter excluded them, and the laird of Buchanan was the lawful grandson of the Duchess Isabel, why were his claims as senior co-heir ignored? Connected as he was by marriage with the most powerful families in the country, he surely had influence enough to procure a reversal of the penal consequences of Duke Murdach's attainder.

[1] From a certified copy of the confirmation charter in the Crathes charter-chest.

[2] In the Session papers in the Lovat Peerage Case (1730) this grant is said to exist among the separate writs in the "Laigh Parliament House," and its date and tenor are given as above. The documents in that place of deposit were afterwards transferred to the General Register House; but this charter is no longer among them. It seems to have disappeared before 1770; as Lord Hailes, when alluding to it in his "Additional Sutherland Case" (c. vi. p. 155), contrary to his wont, makes no mention of where it is to be found.

[3] Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 227. The indiscriminate way in which he is styled Lord of Buchan or Earl of Buchan in public documents is a remarkable instance of the absence of punctilio regarding the appellations of persons of rank, of which Lord Hailes (Additional Sutherland Case, c. v. p. 32, c. vi. p. 156) has supplied us with a number of examples. As witness to charters of 6th January 1407–8 and 20th July 1408, he is Earl of Buchan (Reg. Mag. Sig. pp. 252, 235); in other contemporary and later charters he is Lord of Buchan; and in the Exchequer accounts down to 1412 he is persistently called Lord of Buchan. Many additional instances of the same laxity are furnished by the Exchequer accounts. At the audit of 1405, Archibald fourth Earl of Douglas is called "dominus de Douglas" (vol. iii. page 619); and Alexander Stewart is in the same account first Earl of Mar and then Lord of Mar (ibid. pages 622, 638).

the Regent in September following.[1] He had a charter of Kynedward on the resignation of his niece Euphemia Lesley Countess of Ross;[2] and under a remainder in a charter to the same Countess,[3] he succeeded to the earldom of Ross. In 1420 he headed the Scottish auxiliaries in France, after Baugé he was made Constable of France, and he fell at Verneuil, 17th August 1424. He married in 1413 or soon after it[4] Elizabeth, daughter of Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas, who after his death became wife, first of Sir Thomas Stewart, natural son of Alexander Earl of Mar, and afterwards of William Earl of Orkney. Their daughter Margaret had a dispensation, of date 8th January 1436, to remove the canonical impediment in full knowledge of which she had become the wife of George Lord Seton.[5]

2. ANDREW, died without issue.

3. ROBERT, generally supposed to have fallen at Verneuil, but shown by the accounts to have survived till at least 1431. Though heir to his brother John in the earldoms of Buchan and of Ross under charters granted by their father in 1406 and 1415, he succeeded to neither; but we find him recipient of an annuity of twenty marks from the customs of Dundee, by a grant under the Privy Seal of James I.[6]

Robert Duke of Albany seems to have had at least six daughters, of whom the four first named must have been by his first wife, while the other two were possibly by his second :—

of John of Yle,[1] that is John Lord of the Isles, her aunt's husband. In 1372, when quite a child, she was betrothed to David, infant son of Bartholomew de Loen—a foreign knight, who was in high esteem with David II.—by Philippa of Moubray, niece and representative of the Roger of Moubray who had been attainted for his share in the Soulis conspiracy; but it is doubtful whether this engagement was ever fulfilled. At all events no David appears as owner of the Moubray estates; and the ages of David and Janet render it almost impossible that Sir John of Moubray, who was representative of the family in 1401 and 1409, was their son.[2]

[1] Vol. ii. pages 561, 610.

[2] The Exchequer accounts of 1365 contain a payment of £6, 13s. 4d. "domino Bartholomeo de Leon, militi," towards his expenses on a mission to foreign parts (vol. ii. page 200). His marriage to Philippa Moubray took place in or shortly before 1365. If he was of the same family with John de Loen, to whom, under the designation of "eldest son of the Lord of Heynberg and cousin of the Duke of Gueldres," Richard II. granted a pension of £100 in 1390 (Fœdera, vii. p. 672), his arms, as they appear on his wife's seal, do not correspond with the coat—azure, a star or,—assigned to the family of Loen in Gelderland in Rietstap's "Armorial Général." Philippa's seal, impaling de Loen's arms with her own, is described in Laing's "Catalogue of Scottish Seals" as "Per pale, dexter three eagle's heads erased, sinister, a lion rampant: supporters, two lions sejant gardant." A minute examination of a cast by Mr Laing of the much defaced seal described by him seems to indicate that the heads are transfixed by a line of some sort; and there is a star very conspicuously displayed below the shield and on each side of it. On Roger of Moubray's forfeiture, the Menteith family got his lands of Barnbougle and Dalmeny; but Barnbougle had in 1345 been resigned to the King by John Graham Earl of Menteith and the Countess Mary in payment or security of 2000 marks due by them for marriage and relief, and was, on 6th January 1365–6, granted by charter to Bartholomew and Philippa (Dalmeny charter-chest, as by MS. note of late John Riddell). A few months earlier, David II., for the welfare of his soul and the souls of Bartholomew de Loen and Philippa, granted a portion of the lands of Barnbougle, resigned by them with that object, to the monastery of Lindores (Reg. Mag. Sig. p. 39).

The indenture between the Earl and Countess of Fife and de Loen, of date 20th July 1372, providing for the marriage of the daughter of the former to the son of the latter, is among the separate writs in the

2. A daughter, name uncertain,[1] married, probably before 1385, Sir William Abernethy of Saltoun. Their son, William of Abernethy, is called "nepos" of Albany in the accounts of 1405, when it would also appear probable that he was of age.[2] He is similarly designed by Bower in the mention of his death at Harlaw.[3] Patrick of Abernethy, another son of the marriage, is also called "nepos" of the Governor in the rolls,[4] and as witness to a charter.[5] That the ambiguous word means in these instances grandson and not nephew seems to be shown by the assertion made

General Register House. It settled the whole lands of Bartholomew and Philippa on the heirs of the contemplated marriage, and failing them, on the heirs of Philippa; and the Earl of Fife bound himself to do all in his power to aid de Loen in recovering the whole of his wife's possessions, an engagement which he renewed in a bond of maintenance of date 25th November 1375, also in the General Register House.

If the date assigned in Laing's Catalogue to the seal of Philippa is to be relied on, she was alive in 1395. Reference is made in a manuscript history of the Moubray family communicated by Captain Moubray of Cockairny (the quotations in which from writs in private custody the editor has found generally accurate) to a deed dated on Michaelmas day 1401, said to be in possession of the Earl of Haddington, by which John of Stirling, lord of Cadder, appointed a suitor to do suit for his lands of Craigbrey at the Court of John of Moubray of Dunmanyne (Dalmeny). According to Mr Riddell (note from Mar charter-chest on an interleaved copy of Nisbet's Heraldry in possession of Earl of Crawford) a discharge was given in 1409 "by John Moubray of Dumaine to Sir Robert Erskine of that Ilk, when Erskine gave him the order of knighthood."

[1] In 1404 Robert III. granted a charter to William of Abernethy of Saltoun, "dilecto confederato nostro," and Mary his wife, of the lands of the former in the barony of Rethy and Kingaltvy on his resignation ("Antiquities of shires of Aberdeen and Banff," ii. p. 227). The circumstance that the lady whose Christian name is here given is not designed niece of the King seems to point at her being a second wife, at whose marriage the resignation and regrant may perhaps have been made, rather than Albany's daughter. Both Janet and the wife of Sir William Abernethy must have been among the eldest children of Albany's first marriage; and the editor, though he has enumerated them separately, knows of no positive evidence that they were not the same person.

3. MARGARET, married,—first, Sir John of Swinton, whose previous wife, Margaret Countess of Mar, died in 1390, and who himself fell at Homildon in September 1402. Secondly, Robert Stewart of Lorn and Innermeath. Payments to her son by the former marriage, Sir John Swinton, as "nepoti domini gubernatoris," occur in the accounts of 1415 and 1417.[2] Among the witnesses to a charter of Robert Duke of Albany in 1413 are "David de Edmondstoun, Johanne de Swyntoun, Patricio de Abernethy, nepotibus nostris dilectis."[3] Of the two other "nepotes" with whom he is classed, Edmonstone was nephew, and Abernethy grandson of Albany, leaving it doubtful in which sense the word is applied to Swinton. But a comparison of the passages in the Scotichronicon in which the younger Swinton is mentioned leads almost irresistibly to a conclusion opposite to that formed by Duncan Stewart and the genealogists who have followed him, that grandson is meant.[4] That the Christian name of the mother of the younger Swinton was Margaret is established by a notarial instrument quoted in a paper by Mr Campbell Swinton on the Swinton family, in the Proceedings of the Berwickshire Naturalists' Club. Robert Stewart of Lorn is designed "filio nostro" and "filio nostro in lege" as witness to charters of the Regent in 1409 and 1414.[1] If there be sufficient foundation for the statement of Duncan Stewart, accepted by later genealogists, that the name of his wife was Margaret, we can hardly be wrong in identifying her with the widow of Sir John Swinton, a supposition quite consistent with dates. If otherwise, the wife of Stewart of Innermeath may have been by the second marriage.

4. ISABEL, married,—first, Alexander Earl of Ross, by whom she had Euphemia Countess of Ross, who resigned that earldom in 1415. Secondly, Walter Haliburton of Dirleton, father of Sir Walter Haliburton, Treasurer of Scotland under James II.

by the way doubly ambiguous, as it may mean nephew of Murdach, then Duke of Albany,—the notice of his exploits at Baugé, as it stands in the Cupar MS., seems to fix the meaning of the doubtful word as grandson. He is there called "sororius" (sister's son) of the Earl of Buchan. The natural inference from this passage is, however, avoided in the Swinton genealogy in Douglas' Baronage, by understanding "sororius" as brother-in-law, and imagining a marriage between the younger Sir John Swinton and a daughter of the Duke of Albany, hypothetically his cousin-german, to whom it becomes necessary to assign the name Marjory. It may be remarked, that Albany's daughter Marjory married Duncan Campbell of Lochow, afterwards Lord Campbell; and as Campbell outlived Swinton twenty-nine years, Swinton could not have been her second husband; and the whole dates connected with the Campbell pedigree, including the bestowal of the earldom of Argyll on Marjory's grandson, are inconsistent with his having been a prior husband of that lady.

STEWARTS OF RALSTOUN.

WALTER, eighth High Steward of Scotland, whose marriage with Marjory Bruce in 1315 brought the crown to his son Robert, had no other child of that marriage, Marjory dying soon after Robert's birth in 1316. But by a subsequent marriage[2] he had two sons and a daughter:—

1. Sir JOHN STEWART of Ralstoun, whose name occurs frequently in the Exchequer accounts and in charters of the time. His lands of Ralstoun are described as in the barony of Cunninghame, and are therefore not to be identified with Ralstoun near Paisley, which gives its name to the family of Ralstoun of that Ilk. In the account of the sheriff of Perth rendered in 1358, Sir John Stewart, brother of the Steward of Scotland, is said to have received the fermes of Rate for two past terms.[3] From 1370 to 1377 he received the fee of £20 yearly as Steward of the King's house;[4] and from 1380 to 1416 we find him in receipt of an annuity of £20 paid by the Chamberlain, or sometimes from the customs of Perth.[1] He died in 1416,[2] when he must have been at least 92, as 1326 was the year of his father's death, and he had a younger brother. He has been wrongly identified with the John Stewart who was with David II. at Chateau Gaillard, and there contracted a marriage with Alice, daughter of Reginald More the Chamberlain, and widow of William of Herch (Airth?), in ignorance of a canonical impediment, and in 1340 and 1341 received two papal dispensations removing that impediment.[3] If grown up when David II. was at Gaillard,—that is from 1334 to 1340,—Sir John Stewart would have been considerably above a hundred years of age at his death. His issue seems to have consisted of two (if not three) sons and three daughters :—

[1] In the Cumbernauld charter-chest is a charter by the Duke of Albany of date 28th June 1413, "Malcolmo Flemyng de Bigare et Elizabethe Stewart filie nostre sponse sue."—MS. note by late John Riddell.

[2] Matthew Symson, Duncan Stewart, and other genealogists who repeat their statements, make Marjory Bruce second wife of the Steward. According to them, his first wife was Alice, daughter of Sir John of Erskine, and by her he had an only child Jean, first wife of Hugh Earl of Ross, who afterwards married the sister of Robert I.—a statement which it is difficult to reconcile with chronology. The mother of Sir John Stewart of Ralstoun, who is called the Steward's third wife, is said to have been Isabel, daughter of Sir John Graham of Abercorn.

(1.) Sir WALTER STEWART.—Payments occur to him in the Exchequer accounts from 1379 onwards.[4] He was sheriff of Perth from 1381.[5] He must have owned Ralstoun in his father's lifetime, as there is among the separate writs in the General Register House a confirmation by Robert III. dated 15th April 1396 of a deed by which he pledged it for a debt of 100 marks to Hugh Wallace of Cragy. We find him designed "of Railstoun" in 1391 and 1394:[6] that designation indeed appears to have been shared generally by all the members of that branch of the house of Stewart. He seems to have been employed along with his cousin and namesake the Earl of Athole in ineffective expeditions to restore quiet to the Highlands.[1] He had safe conducts to England in 1393, 1400–1 and 1406;[2] was sent to Paris after the death of Robert III., to renew the ancient league, and was employed in other embassies to the French and Roman courts.[3] In February 1412–13 he had a passport to England to negotiate for the return of Sir Murdach Stewart.[4] He had an annuity of £20 from the customs of Perth from 1428 to 1435,[5] and seems to have died before 1438, as his annuity does not recur in the Perth account of that year, the next which is extant after that of 1435. Immediately after his father's death, he resigned his lands of Ralstoun in favour of William of Douglas, son of his sister Marjory, afterwards Sir William Douglas of Lochleven.[6]

(2.) JOHN STEWART.—Payments by way of annuity are made to him by the Chamberlain in 1382 as "fratri domini Walteri Stewart," and in 1386 as "nepoti regis."[7]

(3.) ROBERT?—Bower[8] and the "Liber Pluscardensis"[9] allude to the heroism of Robert Stewart of Ralstoun as contributing greatly to the victory of Baugé; but they were possibly in error as to the Christian name, and it may have been Sir Walter that fought with the Scots army in France.

(1.) MARJORY[1] married,—first Sir Alexander Lindsay of Glenesk, who died 1382. She was his second wife, and by him was mother of Sir William Lindsay of Rossy[2] and Sir Walter Lindsay. Secondly, before 1387, Sir Henry Douglas of Lugton and Lochleven (fourth son of Sir John Douglas, younger brother of the "Knight of Liddesdale"), who died 1391,[3] and by whom she had Sir William Douglas of Lochleven, who acquired Ralstoun as above from his uncle in 1416. Under the designations of "niece of the King" and "wife of Sir Henry Douglas," and also sometimes as "Marjory Lindsay,"[4] she enjoyed from 1387 an annuity of £20, to which she is said to have had a conjunct right with her husband,[5] and which she received also in her widowhood till 1400.[6] She also received after the death of Sir Henry Douglas his annuity of 50 marks from the customs of Edinburgh, to which she is said to have had a joint right,[7] a pension which, like most others of the same kind, disappears from the rolls on

[1] There has been much misapprehension regarding this lady, who has been called daughter of Sir James Lindsay of Crawford by Egidia the King's sister (Crawford's Peerage, p. 83), daughter of the first Earl of Crawford (Registrum Honoris de Morton, preface, p. xxi.), and daughter of Sir Walter Stewart of Ralstoun (Wood's Douglas' Peerage, ii. 272); but that her descent is as here stated is proved beyond doubt by the indenture between her son and Sir Walter Stewart already alluded to. Her paternity is correctly given in the "Lives of the Lindsays."

[2] That Sir William Lindsay of Rossy was son of this marriage is proved by a charter by Robert II. to Sir David Lindsay, afterwards Earl of Crawford, with remainder to his brother-german Alexander, whom failing, "Willelmo de Lindesay, fratri eciam dicti David, carissima nepte nostra Marjoria de Lindesay suscepto" (Reg. James's return to Scotland. A small annual payment from the fermes of Crail, namely, her third of an annuity of £5 belonging to her first husband Sir Alexander Lindsay,[1] assigned by her to the Minorite Friars of Dundee,[2] enables us to fix the year of her death as 1439.

(2.) EGIDIA, second wife of Sir Patrick Graham of Dundaff and Kincardine. They seem to have been married about 1384. The Chamberlain's accounts rendered March 1384–5 and April 1386 contain two payments, amounting together to £116, 13s. 4d., to Sir Patrick of Graham in virtue of the contract of marriage between him and the King's niece.[3] Patrick Graham, born of this marriage, married Euphemia Countess Palatine of Strathern and Countess of Caithness, daughter and heir of David Earl of Strathern and Caithness, son of Robert II., and became in her right Earl of Strathern; and their son was the Earl dispossessed by James I.

(3.) MARGARET, married 1388, Sir John of Hay. Payments occur in the Chamberlain's accounts of 1388 and 1389, and the customs' account of Banff of February 1390–1, to account of 100 marks granted by the King to Sir John of Hay in marriage with Margaret Stewart the King's niece.[4] There can be little doubt that this lady was a daughter of Sir John Stewart of Ralstoun, and that her husband was Sir John Hay of Boyne and Enzie in the sheriffdom of Banff, and Touch and Tillibothvile (Tullibody) in that of Clackmannan, whose daughter and heir was second wife of Alexander first Earl of Huntley, and ancestress of the Setons of Touch.

2. Sir ANDREW STEWART.—From 1400 to 1413 an annuity was paid by the Chamberlain, sometimes through the custumars of Dundee and Perth, to Sir Andrew Stewart, Knight.[1] The designation "of Raliston" is frequently added;[2] and on two occasions he is called brother of Sir John Stewart of Ralstoun.[3] The last payment allowed to him is in the customs account of Dundee of June 1413, when he is said to be deceased.[4]

1. EGIDIA married,—first, by dispensation, dated 11th April 1346,[5] Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, who died .c 1358; Secondly, Sir Hugh of Eglinton, who died in 1376;[6] Third, Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith. She died 1396. Egidia, as widow of Sir James Lindsay, had one third of his annuity of 100 marks from the customs of Dundee, which third was received from 1365 to 1375 by Sir Hugh Eglinton.[7] In March 1378–9 her third is paid to her, without any indication of her remarriage to Douglas.[8] At the audits of 1379–80, 1380–1, 1381–2 and 1382–3, her son Sir James Lindsay appears as recipient of the whole annuity.[9] From 1383, perhaps in consequence of the disgrace into which her son fell from the slaughter of Sir John Lyon, down to 1396, when she died, her terce is again paid to her and received by her husband Sir James Douglas.[1] The Dundee customs' account rendered in May 1397 indicates that both mother and son had died within the previous year, Sir David Lindsay, afterwards first Earl of Crawford, being in right of two-thirds of the annuity, while the remaining third was paid to the widow of the younger Sir James Lindsay.[2] By her first husband Egidia had two children; namely, Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, who married Margaret daughter of Sir William of Keith the Marischal and heiress of Fermartine, was Justiciary and sheriff of Perth, assassinated Sir John Lyon in 1382, and died in 1397, having had two daughters, married respectively to Sir Thomas Colville and Sir John Herries of Terregles; and Isabel, who married Sir John Maxwell of Pollok. By Sir Hugh of Eglinton, Egidia Stewart had Elizabeth, wife of John Montgomery of Eaglesham, and ancestress of the Earls of Eglinton.

Matilda Stewart, a lady who seems to have been very nearly related to the royal house—legitimately or illegitimately—but whose exact paternity the editor is unable to point out, married Sir William Lindsay of Rossie, nephew of the first Earl of Crawford. During the reign of James I., and in the lifetime of her husband, she drew an annuity of £10 from the customs of Dundee "ex concessione regis pro voluntate sua."[3] After the accession of James II., being in widowhood, she received £20 yearly from the

No. II.

EXCERPT of LETTER from W. HARDY, Esq., Deputy Keeper of Records, regarding Date of Capture of James I., with Extracts from Pells Issue Rolls.

I am at last able to say, without possibility of contradiction, that the dates assigned by Rymer to the three documents in which the Earl of Orkney and his brothers are mentioned viz., August 19th and September 13th, 1405 (vol. viii. pp. 410 and 415), are indisputably wrong. The year in which these safe conducts were granted should be 1407 (8 Hen. iv).

The question appeared to be one of such importance, that I hesitated (until thoroughly satisfied by a careful investigation of the original documents) to assert, that more than a dozen of the entries, cited by Rymer from the "Rotulus Viagii," as belonging to the 6th of Henry IV., really belong to the 8th year of that king's reign.

The difficulties (see note in Pinkerton's History of Scotland, vol. i. pp. 81 and 82) which have arisen in consequence of Rymer's error, in reconciling the conflicting authorities as to the date of the capture of the Earl of Carric by the English, and the death of Sir David Fleming, will be entirely removed by the rectification of the dates as above, and the accuracy of Walsingham's account (Ypodigma Neustriæ, p. 418) will be fully established.

The documents that require emendation in vol. viii. of Rymer's Fœdera are on

The true dates, independently of other grounds, may be ascertained by comparing the places at which King Henry attested public instruments in the autumn of 1405 and 1407 respectively.

From all I have seen, I am inclined to believe, that according to the true date of the documents severally attested by the King, the capture of Prince James preceded only a very short time his father's death on 4th April 1406. Fleming's death should be placed probably about the middle of February 1406 (O.S.); this would agree with the Scottish Exchequer account, in which, as you say, he is represented as deceased in March 1405-6. The Prince's imprisonment in the Tower commenced, we may presume, at the end of February, or early in March 1406 (O.S.)

All the records I have examined confirm the statements of Walsingham as to the date of Northumberland's flight into Scotland in 1405, and his subsequent escape into Wales. The transactions, related by the historian, as belonging to the beginning of the year 1406, are shown by the records to have occurred in that year.

The attestation of documents proves the King's presence at Berwick, Alnwick, and in the north parts, from July to the middle of August 1405 (the 6th year of his reign); on the 17th and 18th of August he was at Leicester, from the 24th to 29th at Worcester, and from September the 4th to the 8th at Hereford, on his way into Wales against the Welsh rebels. On his return from Wales, in the beginning of the 7th year of his reign (1405), we find him again at Worcester from the 1st to the 7th of October; on the 9th he was at Oxford.

He appears to have returned to Westminster about the 14th of October, and to have remained in the neighbourhood till the end of the year (1405), with some few exceptions; as, for instance, he was at Kenilworth Castle on the 1st and 2nd November, and at Dunstable on the 3rd of November.

In the following year (1406), the King was at Westminster and in the neighbourhood during the whole of January, February, and March; on the 14th of April he was at Norwich, on the 18th at Bishops Lynn, and on the 20th at West Dereham.

I have not yet seen anything to show how the Prince was brought from Flamborough to King Henry in London, nor have I had the good fortune to find, as I had expected to do, the royal mandate for his committal to the Tower.

Some extracts from the Pells Issue Rolls I send you herewith. They show that instalments for the cost of his household, when in the Tower with some other prisoners, were paid. The first I have found is on the 14th of August 1406, amounting to £44, 7s. 10d. Another entry shows that the lieutenant of the Constable of the Tower was allowed for the expenses of the household of the son of the King of Scotland 6s. 8d. a day, and for the costs and expenses of four other prisoners with him 3s. 4d. a day; the amount being, from the 6th of July 1406 to the 30th September following, £54, 6s. 5d.

From these extracts it may be inferred that the Constable of the Tower, Sir Thomas Rempston, or his lieutenant, had the charge of the young Prince and other prisoners from an early day in March 1406.

On the 10th of June 1407 (8 Hen. IV.), the King sent his mandate to the Constable of the Tower of London, or his lieutenant, to deliver [[1]], the son of the King of Scotland, and Griffin ap Oweyn Glendordy, being in his custody in the Tower, to Richard Lord Grey, to be conducted to the King's Castle of Nottingham, there to remain "until the King shall think fit to give further order for their deliverance" (Close Roll, 8 Hen. IV. M. 4).

There is still another small difficulty to be cleared, and in this case no objection can be raised as to the accuracy of the dates: you say in your letter that there can be no doubt that the Earl of Orkney accompanied the Prince on his voyage, and was captured with him. Now, if this be so, we cannot, I think, assume that the Earl would be treated as a prisoner by reason of such capture. Henry Earl of Orkney was one of the Scottish nobles who were proposed as hostages for the Earl of Douglas at the time of the capture of the vessel in which Prince James was sailing on his way to France.

The Earl of Orkney, in conjunction with Archibald, eldest son of the Earl of Douglas, and several others, had King Henry's letters of safe conduct to come into England, to remain there without molestation, and to return again to Scotland. The safe conduct is dated on 30th January, 7 Hen. IV. (1406), and was to continue in force until the 1st of May following, with a proviso that it should determine and be of no force so soon as the persons to whom it was granted should become hostages for the Earl of Douglas (Rymer, viii. p. 429).

This safe conduct would consequently enable the Earl of Orkney to return to Scotland after the capture off

Flamborough Head by the English of the vessel on its passage to France.

From later letters of safe conduct, dated 15th March 1406 (enrolled on the Scotch Roll, 7 Hen. IV. M. 2, but omitted by Rymer), it may be inferred that the Earl of Orkney had returned to Scotland under the protection of the safe conduct granted to him on the 30th of January. The safe conduct above referred to (granted on 15th March) "to Henry Sinclare earl of Orkney, and Walter de Haliburton, laird of that Ilk (dominus ejusdem)," was to remain in force until the feast of St John the Baptist next following, but, as in the former case, to cease and be of no force so soon as the said Earl and Walter should become hostages for the Earl of Douglas.

It seems therefore very possible that the Earl of Orkney did accompany the Prince on his voyage to France, and was captured with him (Walsingham, p. 418): but it is not at all certain that he was considered as a prisoner with the Prince.

No. III.

EXCERPT of LETTER from W. HARDY, Esq., Deputy Keeper of Records, regarding Acquittances for James's Ransom.

I am not surprised that you have found some ambiguity in the printed copy of the Scotch Rolls (vol. ii. p. 251), with reference to the series of acquittances for the sums alleged to have been received by the hands of the Treasurer of Calais, in the 3rd of Henry VI. (1425), as portion of the ransom money of King James I.

The original roll presents no such ambiguity. For the sake of making clear the case, as it appears to me, I will first repeat what I have no doubt is already well known to you. The amount of the ransom agreed to be paid (see the Instrument at p. 241), was £40,000, equal to 60,000 marks, the terms of payment being 10,000 marks every year; the first payment to be reckoned as beginning from the day of the Scottish King's arrival in Scotland. The sixth, or last yearly payment of 10,000 marks, was subsequently released to King James, in consideration of his marriage with Joan, daughter of the Earl of Somerset (vol. ii. p. 246). Thus 50,000 marks only were to be paid towards the King's ransom, viz., 10,000 marks a year; the payments spreading over five years.

The proceeds of this ransom appear, for the most part, to have been assigned by King Henry and his council (whether by one, or more Letters of Privy Seal, I am not able to say) to meet the expenses of the works under the superintendence of the Treasurer of Calais; hence the acquittances given are as for so much money "received by the hands of Richard Bokeland, esquire, Treasurer, &c."

The acquittances given on the 14th of February in the 3rd of Henry VI., for the money received by the hands of the Treasurer of Calais, amounted only to 8000 marks; the remaining 2000, due in this year, were assigned (by Letters of Privy Seal, bearing date 9th June, 3 Hen. VI.), to Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, as Captain of the town of Berwick and the East Marches, to meet the expenses of the payments to the soldiers of the garrison &c. An acquittance, bearing the like date, was given for 2000 marks "received by the hands of the same Earl" (vol. ii. p. 253).

On the Scotch Roll for the same year (3 Hen. VI.), there are enrolled, on membrane 14, eight several acquittances for 1000 marks each; one is set out in full, and is followed by seven separate acquittances, which are not set out in full; each acquittance is for 1000 marks. Opposite to the eighth acquittance (which is cancelled) appears a marginal note—printed at p. 251 of vol. ii.—"Cancelled because two other acquittances were substituted, one being for 450, and the other for 550 marks."

On membrane 11, the two acquittances, for 450 and 550 marks respectively, are set out, one in full, the other in the abridged form. Both bear date on the 14th of February, and both are noted in the margin opposite as having been cancelled, because restored on 20th October, 10 Henry VI.

On membrane 12 of the same roll (printed at p. 253 of vol. ii.) are the two entries before referred to, viz., the assignment to Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland for 2000 marks, followed by the acquittance for 2000 marks as received by the said Earl's hands. These entries are not cancelled on the roll.

Thus you will see, that the several sums for which acquittances were given in this year, amounted to 8000 marks received by the hands of the Treasurer of Calais, and 2000 marks received by the hands of the Earl of Northumberland; making together the full instalment of 10,000 marks for the first year's payment of the ransom.

I will now briefly reply to your question. There are, on this roll, eight receipts, dated 14th February, for 1000 marks each, received by the hands of the Treasurer of Calais; the last of these receipts was cancelled, and two others of the same date substituted; these two being the same in amount as that for which the cancelled acquittance was given.

It will thus be seen that the amount for which acquittances were given on 14th February 1425, was 8000 marks, not 5450, or 6450 marks, as in your question. The acquittance given on the 9th of July in the same year for 2000 marks, received by the hands of the Earl of Northumberland, completes the sum of 10,000 marks, for the first year's instalment of the ransom money.

You do not inquire as to the payments in subsequent years, and perhaps they do not interest you: but I may mention, that though in the printed copy, vol. ii. pp. 255, &c., no acquittances are shown as having been given in the 4th of Henry VI., on membrane 9 of the original roll, fifteen acquittances appear to have been given as for money received, on account of the King of Scots' ransom, by the hands of the Treasurer of Calais. These receipts are all dated on 25th July, 4 Henry VI. (1426), and are all cancelled on the roll, as a marginal note states:—"Vac. omnes iste quindecim litere, quia restitute fuerunt per Ricardum thesaurarium, 3° die Marcii anno regni Regis hujus quinto, literis suis de privato sigillo mentionem inde facientibus."

These acquittances were as follows :—

	Marks.
1 for 500 marks . . .	500
9 „ „ „ . . .	4500
5 „ 1000 „ . . .	5000
Marks	10,000

On the Roll of the 5 Henry VI. there is no entry of any acquittances.

On membrane 4 of the roll for 6 Henry VI., there is a copy of the Letters of Privy Seal, dated 8 July, by which the King, with the advice of his Council, assigned to Richard Bukeland, Treasurer of Calais, 10,000 marks, to be received by his hands out of the first monies due to the King for the deliverance of James King of Scots, his cousin, payable by force of the appointment lately made between certain commissioners, &c.

These letters of assignment are followed by inrolments of several acquittances made to the King of Scots, also dated 8 July, viz.,

1 for 1000 marks . . .	1000
9 „ „ „	9000
Total	10,000 marks.

These acquittances and letters of assignment are all cancelled on the roll, and the cause is given in marginal notes, thus :—

Opposite Letters of Assignment. { Vac. iste litere, quia restitute fuerunt per Ricardum thesaurarium infrascriptum, 20° die Octobris anno regni regis hujus decimo cancellandæ, literis suis de privato sigillo de data predicta mentionem inde facientibus.

Opposite the ten Acquittances.

Vac. tres litere de istis decem literis, quia restitute fuerunt, eo quod dominus rex Anglie predictus secundo die Decembris anno regni sui septimo alias literas suas acquietantie fieri fecit predicto regi Scotorum de quingentis marcis predicto Ricardo liberandis.

Vac. residue septem litere de dictis decem litteris, quia restitute fuerunt 20° die Octobris anno regni regis hujus decimo cancellande.

On page 264 of vol. ii. are enrolled the Letters of Privy Seal, dated 2 December, 7 Henry VI. (1428), addressed to John Skipton, clerk of the works at Berwick, &c., by which the King, with the advice of his Council, gives to him authority to receive to the King's use, from the King of Scots, 2500 marks, in part payment of his ransom due to the King. This entry is followed by three acquittances, also dated on 2 December, viz.,

1 for 1000 marks . . .	1000
1 „ „ „	1000
1 „ 500 „	500
Total	2500 marks.

Lower down on the same roll (M. 3), is the entry of another acquittance for 500 marks, also dated 2 December (7 Henry VI.), but not printed, "De acquietantia pro rege Scotorum." I cannot say whether or not this acquittance was for an additional 500 marks, but I think it must have been. This acquittance is cancelled on the roll, and a marginal note opposite to it gives the reason of the cancellation :—" Vac. iste litere, quia restitute fuerunt per Ricardum thesaurarium infrascriptum, 20° die

Octobris anno regni regis hujus decima cancellande, litteris ipsius domini regis de privato sigillo de data predicta mentionem inde facientibus."

On the Pells Issue Roll, for Easter 7 Henry VI. (14 July 1429), is an entry which seems to throw some light on the question of the cancellation of the acquittances above referred to. It is to this effect:—In money paid (in discharge of £400 advanced to satisfy the present necessity of the soldiers in the garrison of Calais), to Richard Buckland, Treasurer of the town of Calais, and marches thereof, whom the now King, with the advice and consent of his Council, appointed to pay the soldiers of the Castle and Town of Calais, and other Castles in the Marches there, out of the sum of 10,000 marks to be paid by the King of Scotland by virtue of an appointment made, between our lord the King and the said King of Scotland. But as the said King of Scotland had not been able to receive, or obtain, the said sum of 10,000 marks, the said lord the King therefore, with the advice and consent of his Council, &c., granted a new assignment of 5000 marks, charged upon the first payment to be made by the Duke of Bourbon to our said King, for payment of the said soldiers, &c.

coriorum et amplius, ut asserit per juramentum suum. Et interrogatus si habuit libros continentes nomina illorum qui dictas pelles et coria habuerunt, respondit quod habuit libros, sed quum preparavit se ad veniendum ad istud scaccarium, Willelmus de Borthwic, capitaneus castri de Edinburgh, misit pro eo et cepit libros suos, nec voluit reddere sibi. Quarum pellium summa custume in denariis extendit se ad sexaginta octo libras undecim solidos et octo denarios, coriorum vero ad centum triginta tres libras sex solidos et octo denarios. De quibus tribus summis lane, pellium, et coriorum, predicti custumarii nullum denarium receperunt, que summa se extendit ad sexcentas et unam libras octodecim solidos et quatuor denarios, super quo consulendus est dominus gubernator, quia nulla coketa data fuit per custumarios dicte ville. COMPUTUM JOHANNIS STEWART COMITIS BUCHANIE, CAMERARII SCOCIE, ET EJUS DEPUTATI.

A.D. 1420.

Computum domini Johannis Forstare de Corstorfine, militis, deputati camerarii, redditum apud Perth, vicesimo octavo die mensis Julii anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo vicesimo, de omnibus receptis suis et expensis ab undecimo die mensis Junii anno etc. decimo octavo usque in diem hujus computi, et sic de duobus annis, coram reverendis in Christo patribus, Gilberto episcopo Aberdonensi, cancellario Scocie, Waltero episcopo Brechinensi, clerico rotulorum et registri, Johanne abbate de Balmurynach, Alexandro de Ogilvy, vicecomite de Forfare, domino Nicholdo Huntare rectore de Ferteviot, secretario domini gubernatoris, et Jacobo de Lawedre, auditoribus per dominum gubernatorem specialiter deputatis.

Idem onerat se, in primis, de lvj ß. x đ., receptis per ballivos de Dunbertane, comparentes. Et de xxvj ß. viij đ., per ballivos de Strivelyne, comparentes. Et de liij ß. iiij đ., per ballivos de Peblis, comparentes. Et de vj ℔., per ballivos de Edinburgh, comparentes. Et de xliij ß., per ballivos de Monrosse, comparentes. Et de iij ℔. vj ß. viij đ., per ballivos de Carale, comparentes.

Summa hujus oneris, xviij ℔. vij ß. vj đ.

Item, idem onerat se de iij ℔. xix ß. viij đ., per vicecomitem de Fyfe, comparentem. Summa patet.

Item, idem onerat se de vij ℔. xiiij ß. v d., per custumarios de Aberden, comparentes. Et de xlviij ß. v đ. ob., per custumarios de Inverkething. Et de xj ß. j đ., per custumarios de Hadingtoun, comparentes.

Summa hujus oneris, x ℔. xiij ß. xj ₰. ob̄.

Item, idem onerat se de liij ß. iiij ₰., per exitus unius itineris camerarie per computantem tenti infra burgum de Peblis, in anno etc. decimonono, infra hoc compotum. Et de v ℔., de exitibus itineris camerarie tenti infra burgum de Hadingtoun in eodem anno.

Summa hujus oneris, vij ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₰.

Et non onerat se de aliquibus aliis exitibus itinerum camerarie, quia nullum iter tenuit nisi tantum in dictis duobus burgis, per tempus computi, nec de wardis, releviis, maritagiis, finibus, et eschaetis, aut aliquibus aliis pecuniarum summis, quia nil plus recepit per tempus computi.

Summa totalis oneracionis, xl ℔. xiiij ß. v ₰. ob̄. Que summa allocatur computanti, in partem solucionis superexpensarum ultimi computi sui, redditi de anno XVII°, et sic debentur eidem de dictis superexpensis cviij ℔. ix ß. ob̄.

Item, allocate computanti per liberacionem factam Johanni Stewart comiti Buchanie, camerario, sub periculo computantis, liij ℔. vj ß. viij ₰. Et clericis scribentibus rotulos scaccarii, v ℔. Et pro apportacione rotulorum ad scaccarium, vj ß. viij. Et officiariis servientibus in domo scaccarii, ex curialitate auditorum, v ℔.

Summa hujus expense, lxiij ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₰.

Summa totalis expensarum, cum superexpensis ultimi compoti sui, clxxij ℔. ij ß. iiij ₰. ob̄. Nota superexpensas.

Compotum nobilis domini, Johannis Senescalli comitis Buchanie, camerarii Scocie, redditum apud Perth vicesimo octavo die mensis Julii anno etc. vicesimo, de omnibus receptis suis et expensis ab undecimo die mensis Junii anno etc. decimo octavo usque in diem hujus compoti.

Idem onerat se, in primis, de xvj ß. vj ₰., receptis a ballivis de Dunbertane, comparentibus. Et de liij ß. iiij ₰., per ballivos de Lanarc, comparentes. Et de iij ℔. vj ß. viij ₰., per ballivos de Carale. Et de xxvj ß. viij ₰., per ballivos de Dunde.

Summa hujus oneris, viij ℔. iij ß. ij ₰.

Item, idem onerat se de xl ℔. xiij ß. iiij ₰., receptis per vicecomitem de Fife, comparentem. Et de iiij^{xx} li., per vicecomitem de Strivelyn. Et de xxvj li. xvij s. iiij d., per vicecomitem de Forfare. Et de ij^{c}xxxvij li. x s., per vicecomitem de Aberdene.

Summa hujus oneris, ccciiij^{xx}v li. viij d.

Item, idem onerat se de j^{c}iiij^{xx}xij li. iiij s. iiij d., per custumarios de Strivelyn, comparentes. Et de j^{c}lij li. xx d., per custumarios de Cupro in Fife. Et de cccj li. v s. j d., per custumarios de Dunde, comparentes. Et de xv li. ij s. v d., per custumarios de Kingorn, comparentes. Et de liiij li. xiiij s. iij d., per custumarios de Northberwic, comparentes. Et de v^{c}xvij li. iij s. iij d., per custumarios de Aberden, comparentes. Et de ciiij^{xx}vj li. xiij s. iiij d., per custumarios de Monros, comparentes. Et de xl li. xj s. ij d., per custumarios de Inverkethyne, comparentes. Et de clxxj li. xiij s. j d., per custumarios de Lynlithqw, comparentes. Et de ciiij^{xx}xv li. xiiij s. j d. ob., per custumarios de Edinburgh, comparentes. Et de xlviij li., per custumarios de Hadingtoun, comparentes.

Summa hujus oneris, mviij^{c}lxxv li. ij s. viij d. ob.

Summa totalis oneracionis, ij^{m}ij^{c}lxviij li. vj s. vj d. ob.

Et non oneratur camerarius de aliquibus wardis, releviis, maritagiis, finibus, et eschaetis, vel exitibus itinerum justiciarie, quia, licet tenta fuerunt in diversis vicecomitatibus per tempus compoti, non constat quod levavit aliquos exitus de eisdem, nec oneratur de exitibus itinerum camerarie, quia, licet tenta fuerunt in diversis burgis per se et suos, non constat de summa exituum eorundem, quia dominus camerarius, ex ordinacione domine gubernatoris, est de presenti in partibus transmarinis.

Expense ejusdem.
